Mr. MANN. The report having been read, is it necessary to read the statement?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary.

Mr. MANN. I suggest the gentleman from New York give us some information concerning these amendments as the Clerk read the report rapidly, and I am glad he did, and we could not follow the amendments. Is the gentleman from New York able to give some information by numbers, so the House can follow as to what amendments are still in disagreement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can do that. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the statement.

Mr. MANN. The rule does not require the statement to be read where the report is read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The following amendments are still in disagreement: Nos. 8, 10, 11, 27 to 33, inclusive—those are the assay-office amendments—44, 61, 82, 93, 97, and 107.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman what was done with amendment numbered 66? Was that agreed to? That is an amendment concerning the Commerce Court, where the Senate struck out "except" and inserted "included." Was that agreed upon?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We agreed to that with a modification. The word "except" is reinstated, and after the word "decree," in line 12, certain language was inserted. I will ask the Clerk to read the language that was suggested.

Mr. MANN. Under the language agreed to, that would still leave the court authority to determine those cases which have been argued before it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to transfer certain cases pending in the Commerce Court on the 1st of December to the district courts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Cases that have not been determined.

Mr. MANN. The way the Senate had the amendment those cases which had been argued in the Commerce Court would have to be reargued in some other court.

Mr. BARTLETT. This amendment of ours obviates that necessity.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. PALMER. Was the Senate amendment to this bill providing for a monthly allowance for employees agreed to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is in disagreement. That is Senate amendment No. 97.

Mr. PALMER. That is to be voted upon by the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. How about the Senate amendment providing for 21 additional Capitol police?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was adjusted by agreeing to 14.

Mr. PALMER. The conference report contains an agreement of the committee for 14?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Well, it is a great mistake.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what was done with Senate amendment relating to interlocutory injunctions suspending or restraining the enforcement, and so forth?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What page?

Mr. COOPER. It is on page 39, amendment 64.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House agreed to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Without any change?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Without any change.

Mr. BURNETT. What was done with the Vice President's automobile?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is in disagreement.

Mr. BURNETT. That is good.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York inform me what was done with amendment 54, on page 32?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was agreed to at $9,000.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The original figure of the House bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amount the House had recommended, fixing it at $9,000, instead of $9,600 as suggested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me about five minutes?

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall yield first five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], a member of the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire at the proper time to make the motion that the House recede on amendments numbered 97 and 107.

The SPEAKER. The time has not come for that yet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not disposed of the report itself.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is this motion to dispose of what you have agreed to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the amendments in disagreement will be taken up in order. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to call the attention of the House to one or two features in this bill illustrating the boasted zeal of the Democratic Party for economy. I signed this report because I did not think there was anything in it so fundamentally bad as to require my dissent, although there are various features in it to which I do not agree, and I presume that is true of every member of the conference committee, that none of us had exactly what he wished.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the increase of the Capitol police force. Those of us on this side of the House remember how in the last Congress the Democratic Party, proclaiming economy as their watchword, boasted of this great reduction in the Capitol police force. It was reduced by the legislative bill against the opposition of the Senate, and that was one of the features which was heralded as proof of the Democratic earnestness for economy.

Now, they having acquired power, we see them coming back and restoring 14 of those who were cut out, so that that side of the House will now be able to have about $15,000 more of patronage to be divided among its Members. I believe at the last Congress it was caucus action which cut down this police force. If I remember rightly, the Democratic caucus decreed this reduction, and, if I remember rightly, the Democratic caucus also decreed that the one month's extra pay, which follows shortly after that in this bill, was also to be cut out. I am wondering if, after the House has these 14 more policemen, they are going to proceed to break their promises and boasts of the last session again and give the month's extra pay to the employees of the House.

This is simply, Mr. Speaker, the beginning. It is exactly the process which we on this side of the House predicted they would follow, namely, cut down when they are out of power and as soon as they are in power forget their professions, ignore their promises, and begin to agitate the question of patronage which they were so boastful about giving up.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down. What was done with the amendment giving an additional clerk to each Senator who has only two at present?

Mr. GILLETT. If I remember rightly, the House yielded upon that.

Mr. PAYNE. Yielded upon that? I can hardly see upon what theory. Here are over 400 Members of the House with only one clerk each, and the Senators, one of whom only represents the undivided congressional district, are to have three. I think the House is humiliating itself by any such legislation as that.

Mr. GILLETT. I will refer the gentleman to the chairman of the committee for explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes now. If the gentleman wishes more time, I will yield it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is well taken. [Applause.] This question of the Capitol police has been a controverted one between the House and the Senate ever since the beginning of the last Congress, and our side of the Congress and our committees of conference have uniformly insisted upon the maintenance of the reduced force, and up to this time have never receded from that position. And I am surprised that the committee now, without anything like notice to the Members of the House, should have brought in an agreement adding 14 men to this roll of policemen. For one I earnestly and vigorously protest against it.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PALMER. In just a minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. There was no suggestion or request of any Member that this amendment be submitted separately.

Mr. PALMER. But what I say is that inasmuch as this thing has been up so many times in the House and the House so overwhelmingly insisted on the roll remaining as we determined it should be at the beginning of the last Congress, we had a right to assume that the conference committee would not deliberately change this number of policemen without coming to the House with it.

Now, what are the facts about this thing? I want to say for one that, so far as I am concerned, although this is a conference report upon an appropriation bill and we must vote the whole report up or vote the whole report down, I would vote it down rather than commit this absolute breach of faith with the American people upon this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For it is precisely as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said. We came before the House two years ago with an honest and a sincere effort to show the country that we would stand for economy and begin that economy here in the House, and we cut off something like $200,000 of the House's expenses. The country approved it; our own judgment approved it, and I say to you, my fellow Members of the majority here, that we ought to stand by it right through. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, there is absolutely no merit in the demand for more policemen here in the Capitol, in my judgment. What are the facts? Two years ago, when we came into power here in the House, we found that the Capitol had 73 policemen—3 lieutenants, 2 special officers, and 67 privates—while the House Office Building had 1 captain, 1 lieutenant, and 15 men; a total of 17, making a grand total of 90 policemen for the Capitol Building and the House Office Building. We cut that down so that in the House Office Building we left 1 lieutenant and 10 men, and in the Capitol itself we left 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, 2 special officers, and 33 men.

Now, I submit that, so far as this Capitol Building is concerned, 33 policemen, being 11 men for each shift of 8 hours in the day, are absolutely ample for the protection of the building and the keeping of order here. Why, here we have a single building in a park about as big as four city squares with more policemen now than many a city in the country with forty or fifty thousand population employs.

When this matter was up in the House before, I called the attention of the House to some cities and their police forces. I remember particularly calling attention to the city of Harrisburg, a city of 64,186 persons, which has a police force of 54 men, with a pay roll of $49,920. And yet here we are in a single building, populated by not over a thousand or fifteen hundred souls at the outside, employing 73 policemen to maintain order. It was foolish, it was absurd, and we were dead right in cutting it out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PALMER. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. PALMER. In the city of Harrisburg, that I was referring to, with a population of 64,000 people, there is a capitol building in a capitol park almost as large as this Capitol Building and park, and a body of legislators that are no more law-abiding than we are, and they have not had any trouble with a police force of 54 men. The city of Easton, the biggest city in my district, with a population of nearly 40,000, has 20 policemen, with a pay roll of $14,700. The city of Trenton, N. J., with a population of 100,000, has a hundred policemen.

Now, I do not believe for a minute that these men are necessary, and what our friends on the other side are going to say is what they have a perfect right to say, namely, that although they are not necessary, we are putting them back in order to supply jobs for somebody.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BATHRICK. I ask for information, in order to get some facts on which I may predicate my own action in this matter. I desire to know how many doors there are in this building, upstairs and downstairs, into which a marauder could get at night if only 11 policemen were watching them?

Mr. PALMER. I can not tell offhand, but—

Mr. BATHRICK. I understand there are 14 downstairs.

Mr. PALMER. I can not say offhand, I say, but I know this, that we have been operating ever since the beginning of the last Congress with a total of 33 men, 2 special officers, 2 lieutenants, and a captain, and, so far as I have heard, there has been no disorder, there has been no crime, there has been no danger resulting to men here by reason of that small force.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield again? I am seeking for information. I do not care to be a party to any unusual or unreasonable expense to the Government, but we have here some paintings that are worth from $20,000 to $30,000, and 14 entrances to the building, with 11 men on a shift to watch them. I do not say that we need 14 men, but it seems to me that we need more than we have.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. PALMER. If the gentleman will wait until I answer the gentleman from Ohio. You have got that many policemen and 430 Members of Congress, with ninety-odd Members of the Senate, constantly passing back and forth, who are helping to guard the building against vandals. The doors are locked at night.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know of any doors that are not locked up after 5 o'clock with the exception of the one on the House side and one on the Senate side?

Mr. PALMER. I know the most of them are locked.

Mr. MANN. If a Member wants to get out after 5 o'clock he has to go that way.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield, I want to ask if he ever saw a policeman at the south door or the west door at any time in the day?

Mr. PALMER. I have not seen many policemen.

Mr. PAYNE. There is only one in this end of the building.

Mr. PALMER. Now, as to the House Office Building, I understand that there has been some claim made that we cut too deeply in the House Office Building police force. There was a single building with probably five entrances, and we cut it to 1 lieutenant and 10 policemen. Now, I say about that as I say about the Capitol Building, that I have yet to hear of any disorder or any crime having been committed in the House Office Building which would have been prevented if there had been more policemen there.

I took occasion to examine into this question of policemen for these buildings two years ago, and I will state one instance. The Land Title Building in the city of Philadelphia has 1,100 rooms, with 365 tenants and about 1,500 occupants. It is situated on the corner of Broad and Chestnut Streets, one of the busiest thoroughfares in that great city, where thousands and thousands of people sweep past every day. It has three large entrances upon both streets, and they have four policemen to maintain order and decorum in all that building.

Now, I say, it is absurd for us, after having justified this decrease in the last Congress in the interest of economy, by starting out to run the House on a businesslike basis, to now, by reason of any fancied necessity on the part of any Member, take a back track and make ourselves ridiculous on this question. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BROCKSON. Will the gentleman from New York yield five minutes to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to sit by or aid in the increase of the police force here without sufficient proof that they are needed. What has been said on the Republican side and said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is true as to my district as in other districts. We did preach economy in my district, and one of the items of economy to which we pointed was the reduction of the unnecessary force about this Capitol, specifically pointing to this reduction, and pointed to it with pride. Now we are asked to put back 14 policemen without any reason that I have heard. I have been here since the 7th of April last and I have heard of no disorder here or in the House Office Building. I have heard of no misconduct and of no attempt at vandalism that would require additional police force. I submit that the Democratic Party is committed to a policy of economy and not to extravagance, and I am opposed to this increase in the police force.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, as one of the managers on the part of the House I agreed to the compromise arrived at with the Senate in its proposition to increase the Capitol police force by 21 members. In the House Office Building, this Capitol, and the Senate Office Building there are 61 police officers. Their duty is not solely and entirely to keep order. They are needed more in the capacity of watchmen. The value of these properties is conservatively estimated at $20,000,000, and with three shifts a day there can be on duty at one time guarding the entrances and patrolling the buildings but 20 men. There is no fire-alarm system in the Capitol, there is no fire-protection system, and the only protection there is against disastrous fire in this building is that which may come from the vigilance of the men appointed in the capacity of policemen properly to patrol and watch the building. The Senate, which is a coordinate branch of the Congress, believe that 21 additional men are necessary. After the Senate had adopted that amendment I conferred with men in charge of this force, with the Sergeant at Arms, and with the Speaker. The Speaker related some experiences that he personally had as chairman of the House Office Building Commission, and I reached the conclusion that on this side of the Capitol these additional men were required. I assume that if 6 additional men were required here, 6 additional men would be required upon the other side. The Senate conferees insisted that at least 7 additional men were required on each side, and the House conferees, because of the insistence of the Senate, acquiesced in the additional 2 men in order to reach an agreement. I believe that the House did wrong when it cut down so extensively the Capitol police force two years ago [applause], and I do not hesitate to make that admission when convinced that that is the fact.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to ask the gentlemen if this is not true, that to this Capitol great throngs of visitors are coming, and these men ought to be on hand to direct people where to go?

Mr. BURNETT. Have we not guides for that purpose?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the guides are paid. People who want to go on exploration tours hire the guides, but these men ought to be stationed around the building at convenient places to direct people where they should go to transact public business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the House made a too radical cut in the police force of this Capitol, and it is easy to understand how it was done, and I can appreciate the criticism made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. The cut was not made upon an investigation conducted by any of the regularly constituted committees of this House. Before the Democrats had organized the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself made an investigation of the conditions existing around this Capitol, and he suggested to a Democratic caucus that, as a result of his investigation, there were certain places in the House and Capitol organization that were unnecessary, and as a result of his investigation, and upon his recommendation, the Democratic caucus agreed that there should be a certain cut in the police force of the Capitol.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I just want to correct the statement of the gentleman. The investigation was made by a committee consisting of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], and myself, who reported to the Committee on Ways and Means, which was considering the question, which committee reported it to the caucus, where the report was adopted by a practically unanimous vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was, and any report made by the Committee on Ways and Means to that caucus would have been adopted. [Laughter.] Why not be perfectly frank about it? These gentlemen were a self-constituted committee who undertook to discharge the duties of the regular committees of the House, and the caucus, upon their presentation of the question, made up, as it was, of men who had never had anything to do with the consideration of the necessity for these matters, because of the committee service of these gentlemen, agreed to their report.

I have made such investigation as I could in my position, and I agreed to this increase because I believe that 12 of these men are absolutely necessary and the Senate insisted 14 were necessary. Mr. Speaker, I place my record for economy in this House against that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [applause], or the gentleman from Delaware, or any other gentleman, and I challenge anyone in this House to point to a single act of mine in this House where I have supported or recommended or urged the creation of positions, either in this House or the Senate or in any of the executive departments, merely to supply patronage that some one might have an opportunity to fill it.

I have stood here for 14 years waging the battle of Democracy for economy and it comes with ill grace from any Member upon this side to charge me in the discharge of my duties, endeavoring against great odds to have the Democratic Party to carry out its pledges for economy, with being actuated by a desire merely to supply places for Members, when in the conscientious discharge of my duties I am honestly convinced that those places are necessary. I am willing to go to the country on this record. I am willing to present to the country my judgment as to the desirability and necessity of these places against the judgment of either gentlemen upon that side or gentlemen upon this side. Gentlemen upon that side, in view of their record, can not criticize this side of the House either for its cuts or for the putting back of places we might consider necessary. I recall when the House Office Building was first opened and the proposition was made to create a very large number of police for that building, I was one of the Members from both sides who prevented the enactment of legislation that would create those positions. Members speak of 10 men being sufficient in the House Office Building. Mr. Speaker, there is no more comparison between that building and the Land Title Office Building in Philadelphia than there is between day and night. The Land Title Office Building is a 12 or 15 story modern office building. One man stationed in the central corridor on the main floor can see every person who comes into that building. When a person enters an elevator and goes to the upper portion of the building—some of the floors are occupied entirely by a single business concern—from the elevator the step is directly into a business office.

On the other floors you step into a small corridor and can go only into some office. People go there to transact business. Not all of those who go to the House Office Building go to transact business. A large proportion go to pester and to annoy and to bother and to interfere with Members of Congress in an attempt to discharge properly their official duties. [Applause.] When the Capitol police force was cut down it became necessary for the House Office Building to close at different times some of the entrances to the building. There was more complaint and more grumbling and there was more dissatisfaction because gentlemen were compelled to go out one door rather than another than there is over Congress being compelled to continue in session at this time. Those who come to this Capitol, Mr. Speaker, come here from all over the country—come here from all over the civilized world. They are not a disorderly lot of persons, they are for the most part an orderly, intelligent, interested class of people, anxious to see this Capitol, and yet watchmen are necessary. The iconoclasts and souvenir seekers constantly are here. They act as if it were desirable to go to the bronze doors on the east front of the Capitol and knock off a leg here or a head there or an arm some other place or some other portion of those doors and bring them home and keep them as souvenirs. There have been times when some of the paintings in the Capitol have been injured. It is easy to say that 10 men on this side of the Capitol on each shift are sufficient.

The records of the Sergeant at Arms' office show that 5 per cent of those men on the average are incapacitated because of sickness during the year and 8 per cent of them are unavailable if the usual leave of absence be given to them, so that when the matter is carefully investigated, when it is properly investigated, when the facts are known, I believe that no charge can honestly be made against the House for extravagance or for an unnecessary or unjustifiable number of men in keeping this Capitol in order and preserving it. Gentlemen talk about the police force in small communities. There can be no comparison and there is none between conditions in such communities and the situation here. And I say that, so far as I am concerned, believing that an additional number of these men were necessary, and the only difference existing between those representing the Senate and those representing the House being a question of two policemen in the Capitol, I did not think it sufficient to justify disagreement upon this item.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman pardon a statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. At the time the new Office Building was opened, the Committee on Accounts, of which I had the honor of being a member, after a thorough investigation of the matter, brought in a report that 21 men and 3 officers were necessary. There was opposition on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], as well as on the part of a few on the other side of the House, and it became so bitter that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the committee, moved to amend by making the number 14 men. I thought that it was a mistake at the time. I think so now. During this session of Congress the gentleman sitting on my left [Mr. BRUCKNER] has had an overcoat stolen from his office, and I believe that is not the only depredation which has been committed there. I think it necessary to make this statement from the facts known to me, that they may know my observation and experience since this Office Building was opened five years ago, as well as the rumors flying around the corridors of the building that may affect the character of the membership of this House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULDEN. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York has just stated that when the original proposition came from the Committee on Accounts it provided for 21 policemen?

Mr. GOULDEN. That was the unanimous report.

Mr. MANN. Well, his recollection may be better than mine, although my recollection is that the original report provided for 35 policemen in the House Office Building. I led the fight against it, and we skinned the proposition. I think the number was 35.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not remember the number. At present they have 10, with 1 officer, and I do not believe it is sufficient.

Mr. PALMER. Would the gentleman be willing, in order that the sense of the House may be tested, to make an exception of this item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no way in which it can be done.

Mr. PALMER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not. There is no parliamentary procedure by which this item can be taken out of this report.

Mr. PALMER. But we can, however, have a vote on this without taking it out of the report.

The SPEAKER. The conference report must be voted on as a whole.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] with reference to the action of the Ways and Means Committee on the report of the committee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] was one.

Now, were the objections that you urge now urged then?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. In the committee that had the determination of the number?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I was not on the Committee on Ways and Means and I do not know what transpired in that committee.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. But you have made a statement that anything coming from the Ways and Means Committee would go through.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I meant at that time. Anybody who was here at that time would agree to that statement. The Democratic caucus had selected that committee for the purpose of organizing the House, and I was not in particularly good odor anyway, and any suggestion I might have made in the caucus would have been futile.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to urge upon the gentleman that if his objection is good now, it should have been good then, and the wisdom of the committee, or the caucus, whichever was the determining factor, should have excluded the number of people they want now to put on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not participate in the discussion of the caucus.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Another question I want to ask the gentleman. From what source does the objection come now as to the inefficiency of the number, or lack of numbers, and what proof has the gentleman that there is no sufficient number, or that the force is not doing its duty properly?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not said it is not doing its duty properly, or that it is inefficient. I believe it is insufficient. I base that upon information that comes to me as a Member of the House Office Building Commission and from the Sergeant at Arms, under whom these officers are.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a second? I am also a member of the House Office Building Commission. My office is not in the House Office Building, and I do not have occasion to visit that building often. I seldom go there, except when I go on business.

I have had a number of complaints, from that side of the House especially, that there was danger of scandal in the House Office Building. I think that we are in considerable danger of scandal that may be caused by some employee or some Member of the House in the House Office Building that may be very injurious to every Member of the House, and there is no question whatever that in some way, either by additional policemen or by some other method, greater care will have to be taken about people who go into the House Office Building, especially at night—and not all men—or there will be trouble for a great many Members of Congress, nobody knowing who may be suspected. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit an observation or two with reference to this question.

I believe that it was a mistake when we adopted the resolution cutting off a large number of House employees. I believe I violate no confidence when I say that I voted against it in the caucus. For more than two years the door at the southeast corner of the House Office Building has been closed, and there is no watchman at that door. All during the Sixty-second Congress and to this date during the Sixty-third Congress I have not received a bound volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The fact is that this cutting off of the help has crippled the service. [Applause.]

There is no question about it; and I want to say as a Democrat, and, Mr. Speaker, an Andrew Jackson Democrat [applause], that I believe the Democratic Party will come nearer challenging the respect and confidence of this country when it abandons this "peanut" plan of economy and goes after the millions of dollars that are being squandered in the various departments. [Applause.]

We can not make any reputation by cutting off a few janitors and charwomen, but we can make a reputation by going into these great executive departments of the Government and uncovering Republican misrule, by which millions of dollars of the people's money have been squandered. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I am opposed to this "peanut" plan of economy. I do not believe in it. I believe that the American people will applaud us when we give to the Congress every facility for the proper discharge of our duties here. We can not discharge the duties of our office unless we have the help that we ought to have.

This question of discharging a few charwomen, murdering a few janitors, and killing a few ordinary second-class clerks does not challenge the admiration of the people and does not rise to the dignity of American statesmanship. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report Senate amendment No. 8.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "fourteen," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That hereafter any deputy collector of internal revenue or deputy marshal who may be required by law or existing regulations to execute a bond to the collector of internal revenue or United States marshal to secure faithful performance of official duty may be appointed by the said collector or marshal, who may require such bond without regard to the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States,' approved January 16, 1883, and amendments thereto, or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof, and the officer requiring said bond shall have power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and appoint his successor at his discretion without regard to the act, amendments, rules, or regulations aforesaid."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment. I ask that the Clerk report the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to insist on the disagreement to Senate amendment No. 8.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in this amendment with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does a motion to agree to the Senate amendment take precedence to a motion to concur with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. A motion to recede and concur would take precedence to a motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I thought some brave man would like to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to recede and concur with an amendment. That is a preferential motion to the motion of the gentleman from New York. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 8 with the following amendment:

"On page 2, line 21, strike out the words 'or existing regulations' and insert 'or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal.'"

Mr. BATHRICK rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. BATHRICK. I desire to ask when it is in order for me to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. To what?

Mr. BATHRICK. To amendment No. 8.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer it as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send his amendment to the desk that the Chair may determine whether it is in order? The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "thereof," in line 4, page 3, insert a period and strike out the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not an amendment to my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BATHRICK. I have no means of knowing what the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is except from hearing it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion of the gentleman from Georgia again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 8 with the following amendment:

"On page 2, line 21, strike out the words 'or existing regulations' and insert 'or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal,' so that the paragraph will read: 'Provided, That hereafter any deputy collector of internal revenue or deputy marshal who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal to execute a bond to the collector of internal revenue.'"

And so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the disposition of the House is as to debate on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think we want some time to debate on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not know whether an hour would be sufficient.

Mr. MANN. We think an hour would be sufficient if we can have one-half of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia. I am opposed to his amendment.

Mr. MANN. But we want some time on this side of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Are there not some Members in favor of my amendment over there?

Mr. MANN. Oh, we are all patriotic people over here, and I do not think anyone favors the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Would it be a matter of privilege in the House for me to rise now and say that I have sent three times to the document room for a copy of the sundry civil act of this session and have been unable to receive any attention from the document room, through the incompetency of the officials of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think that is a privileged question.

Mr. MANN. Well, we maintain a document room, and when we want the documents there is no way of getting them. The document room is open, and I sent a very intelligent page there three times without getting the document I want.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to suggest to the gentleman that possibly the document might be exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Then certainly that would be another evidence of incompetency. If we pass acts and there are no copies in existence in the document room, that is evidence of incompetency, for the Committee on Printing has the authority to provide them. We want a copy of the sundry civil act of this session of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, we will supply the gentleman with a copy.

Mr. MANN. Well, do it quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will supply the gentleman with a copy in a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question the gentleman from Illinois has raised is a question of high privilege.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, but I did not wish to raise it in the form of a question of privilege. I wanted to call the attention of officers in charge of the document room to the fact that it is their business when the House is in session to supply copies of current laws.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that probably his trouble arises from the fact that a man named Rupel, from New Jersey, was demoted in the document room. If he had been left there the gentleman would have gotten what he wanted.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not send to the folding room. That would be closed up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are gentlemen on this side of the House who desire to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, and there are gentlemen who wish to speak in favor of it, and I should like to have an adjustment of the time.

Mr. MANN. Well, say 20 minutes over here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this Senate amendment be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and one-half by myself.

Mr. MANN. How much time will this side get out of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman said he desired 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. But if the gentleman is going to extend the time beyond an hour, I want 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Twenty-five minutes are desired on this side in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. I am entitled to control the time in opposition.

Mr. MANN. That is all very true; but that side of the House is not entitled to all of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the House is not divided on this question by the center aisle. It is divided by the way gentlemen think about the matter.

Mr. MANN. It will be divided that way when we come to make unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be true; but I suggest to the gentleman that he said he wanted 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Twenty minutes out of the hour, and since that time I have had applications for 20 minutes' more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes; that he control one half of the time and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] the other half, with the understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is to be granted 30 minutes' time out of that hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. No; Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] will have control of the 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, then, Mr. GILLET.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, no amendment is in order at this time. I have the floor, and I am submitting a request for unanimous consent. I decline to yield for an amendment until we get this matter adjusted.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this matter be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, one-half of that time to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia, and that at the conclusion of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the pending motion, and I to yield 20 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. But we want 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I can not give the gentleman 30 minutes out of 45 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then add 10 minutes to the time for debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 1 hour and 40 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and one-half by myself, and the gentleman from Georgia and myself out of that time will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] 30 minutes, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that debate extend for an hour and 40 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], with the agreement that 30 minutes of that time be yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET], and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire if the gentleman, having the power to raise the point of order on my amendment, will permit the injection of that amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia has moved to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. Unless the gentleman from Georgia is willing to accept what the gentleman from Ohio wishes to offer as a part of his motion there is no way I can consent to its being placed before the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it not in order under the rules of the House for the gentleman from Ohio to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia by amending his proposition?

The SPEAKER. That would depend entirely upon whether the gentleman has the floor and whether or not it is germane.

Mr. HARDWICK. If it is germane and the previous question is not ordered, the gentleman's amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is in order.

Mr. BATHRICK. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment if I can get that privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment which the gentleman suggests is not an amendment to the motion proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BATHRICK. I think it is. If the gentleman will read it I think he will find that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless the gentleman from Georgia consents there is no way I know of to get it before the House.

The SPEAKER. This amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not germane, anyway, to the Bartlett amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the Chair to submit the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether at this time I ought to state it or not, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just made the statement it was impossible to obtain a copy of the last sundry civil bill—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman either to object or to withdraw and not to inject an independent matter in here under the guise of reserving the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Give him a chance to make a statement.

Mr. RAKER. I reserve the right to object, it will not take but a moment to state it. I touched a bell here at my right and a page brought in one of the bills. On the other hand, I touched the bell and another page came and brought the bill in here, so there are plenty of these bills in the House if the gentleman will send a page for them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I want to say the document room is not correctly informed, I sent an intelligent page to the document room—

Mr. BARTLETT. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman object or not?

Mr. RAKER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then let the gentleman object.

Mr. RAKER. Then I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, do it, then.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded and the question is, Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and I give notice that within my hour I shall move the previous question upon the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois wish?

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that instead of moving the previous question within his hour that at the end of a certain length of time the gentleman from Massachusetts take the floor and then he will have the right to move the previous question at the end of the time originally agreed upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the purposes of amendment No. 8 were discussed this afternoon, and I stated that I was in favor of that amendment, but that it was necessary, in order to carry out the purposes of the amendment, to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. The Senate amendment reads this way:

Provided, That hereafter any deputy collector of internal revenue or deputy marshal who may be required by law or existing regulations to execute a bond to the collector of internal revenue or United States marshal.

There are no existing regulations that require the deputy marshal or deputy collector to give bonds. Section No. 3148 of the Revised Statutes requires deputy collectors to give bonds when required to do so by the collector. But deputy marshals give bonds not by reason of any law or by reason of any regulation of the Department of Justice, but because the marshal who appoints them requires them to do so and has authority to require them to give bonds.

One of the Assistant Attorneys General, in discussing this proposition yesterday, stated that there were no existing regulations of the Department of Justice requiring a deputy marshal to give bond. And the chairman of the Civil Service Commission has written a letter in which he takes the position that if Congress passes this act in the language in which it comes from the Senate it will be futile and ineffective to carry out the purpose which the Senate has in view, because Congress has put into it the words "under existing regulations," while there are no existing regulations. Therefore, to carry out the purpose which the framers of this amendment had in view, and to accomplish what we hope to accomplish by it; that is, to take from under the Executive order of 1906 of President Roosevelt the deputy United States collectors and deputy United States marshals, I move to concur in this amendment with the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, which is a plain proposition that the deputy collectors and the deputy marshals of the United States who are by law or may be required by their superior officers to give a bond for the faithful discharge of their duties shall not be taken from the eligible list or be confined to the civil-service law.

Now, that is the whole of it. I could not make it any plainer if I were to discuss the question for one hour or more. My effort is simply to perfect this amendment in order to make it mean what we intended it to mean, and not leave in it the words "existing regulations," which were put upon this bill from the floor of the Senate about 10 or 11 o'clock at night, when the Senate had no quorum present, and when the Senator in charge of the bill was compelled to accept that amendment in order to get his bill through.

We hear a good deal, Mr. Speaker, said about civil service, and what the Republicans have done in the way of civil service. I undertook to make some remarks to-day upon that subject, but I want to call attention to one particular instance of the civil service which is a matter of record in this House. Mr.

Speaker, I want to call attention to one instance of the way in which civil service was carried out by the last Republican administration. We know that this House granted to the Department of the Interior at one time $1,000,000, and $750,000, and $500,000, to bring up the work in the Land Office. We know that a public scandal grew out of the administration of affairs in the Interior Department, and that this House had what was known as the Ballinger investigation by reason of that. It was developed in that investigation that when they went to appoint these hundreds and hundreds of employees, numbers of whom have since been covered into the civil service, that they were appointed by the officer whose authority it was to make the appointment under the direction from Mr. Ballinger, to appoint those that were recommended by Mr. Hitchcock, who at that time was the Postmaster General and chairman of the Republican national committee.

Now, I would not make a statement like that unless I had the proof. You will find in the hearings of the Ballinger committee a statement of Mr. Vertrees, who was then on oath, that Mr. Schwartz had received this telegram:

I am just advised by Commissioner Dennett of your telegram in reference to the increase in the number of special agents of the expected class. I desire that you, in making any of these appointments, in addition to the President being consulted, Gen. Hitchcock be also consulted, provided the appointees are not directly suggested by the President.

Now, the Interior Department was filled with men appointed, not by the President, not by the Secretary of the Interior, but by the direction of the Postmaster General, who was at the time chairman of the Republican national executive committee. And numbers of those men, I have been informed, have since been covered into the civil service. That is characteristic of the administration of the civil-service law under the past Republican administration. They appoint men for political reasons, cover them into the civil service by Executive order, and then hold up their hands in holy horror and proclaim that this is the holy of holies of all things connected with the Government, which no man shall lay his profane hand upon.

For one I detest such hypocrisy, and whenever I get an opportunity, such as I have to-night, to strike at that kind of pretentious hypocrisy I shall do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the balance of his 30 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senate taking these employees out of the protection of the civil-service law.

I make no hypocritical pretense of being an extreme civil-service reformer. I am one of those who believe that in the administration of the affairs of the Government, while a large number of positions in which the tenure of office of the occupants should be protected, so that there shall be a permanent civil establishment, at the same time there are a large number of positions the occupation of which so affects the politics of the country and is so identified with the administration politically that they should be filled by men who are known to be politically in sympathy with the administration.

Mr. Speaker, the positions affected by the Senate amendment are now in the classified service. Under the civil-service law the President of the United States has the power to exempt these places from the operation of the law.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman inform the House as to whether or not this class of employees, covered by Senate amendment No. 8, was turned into the civil service by Executive order in the first instance, or did they stand a competitive examination?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe everybody in the classified service, so far as I recall, has been put there by Executive order. These particular positions were put into the classified service by a Republican President after the places had been filled with active Republican political workers. I believe the efficiency of the service would be very greatly increased in many instances if they were taken out and men appointed who are qualified and have demonstrated their capacity for the positions.

I believe also, Mr. Speaker—and I do not hesitate to say so—that I am so constituted politically that I believe a Democrat is always more likely to render efficient service to the public than a man of any other political faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It may be that I am somewhat prejudiced and partisan in my professions, but I have so much sympathy with the theories of the Democratic Party, and I believe so firmly in the principles of the party, that I have more confidence in men professing the same political principles as myself being efficient public servants than men of any other political faith. But as the President, under the law, has the power to exempt these positions it seems to me under the circumstances that it is unwise for Congress to enact legislation which takes out of the President's hands these questions and takes these employees out of the classified service.

Without occupying any more of the time of the House in giving expression to my views, but simply desiring to state my position, I reserve the balance of my time. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET], a member of the committee, desires to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. GILLET. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York yields to me to be recognized in my own time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, this Democratic administration is characterized so far by an extreme partisanship and a greed for patronage. The partisanship has been exemplified in this House beyond any precedent in my experience by passing every considerable measure under the whip of the party caucus. Even the currency bill, which to-day we are told from high authority is not a partisan question in the Senate, where they need some Republican votes, was in this House considered in a strictly partisan manner and as a strictly partisan question, and Republican votes and opinions were disregarded, and the bill was determined in a party caucus.

As a natural result of extreme partisanship comes greed for patronage, and this amendment is the latest manifestation of that characteristic.

Last week we had an extreme instance of it in connection with the conference report on the tariff bill. The Senate there put on a provision exempting the income-tax collectors in the Internal-Revenue Bureau from civil-service examination, and then the House conferees amended the Senate provision so ingeniously that it allowed the whole internal-revenue office to be filled with spoilsmen. Apparently neither House dared to accomplish it openly and straightforwardly; apparently they were both afraid of public opinion and wanted to cover up their purpose, so the House adroitly accomplished their end by adding the following innocent-looking amendment:

Provided further, That the force authorized to carry out the provisions of section 2 of this act, when not employed as herein provided, shall be employed on general internal-revenue work.

What was the purpose and effect of that harmless-appearing amendment? The effect is that the men appointed to collect the income tax and who by the Senate amendment can be appointed without any examination, and so will be mere political employees, can be used to do other internal-revenue work. Consequently, by appointing more than are necessary to do the income-tax work the present force of experienced civil-service employees in the Internal Revenue Division can be gradually dropped out and their places filled by these Democratic patronage appointees. That I believe was the purpose of that amendment. They did not dare to openly and avowedly provide that all employees of this great division should be appointed under the old spoils system, but they saw the opportunity to indirectly attain that result and they could not resist the temptation. The greed for patronage was stronger than their platform pledge, and they abandoned the merit system in order to give themselves patronage.

Here in this amendment is another manifestation of the same spirit. This is even going a step further. The other applied to new offices only, while this goes back and takes a set of offices which for years have been under civil service and makes them the spoils of party. Arguments are offered now, as always, that there are special reasons why these places should be exempt, but we know, and you know, that the only real reason for this amendment was the one admitted this afternoon by the gentleman from Kentucky—because the Democrats want the offices and ought to fill them. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] this afternoon said that 95 per cent of the men in office under the civil service were Republicans. He said that that indicated one of two things—either the Democrats were sadly lacking in intelligence or there was not a fair administration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Civil Service Commission ever since Theodore Roosevelt resigned from it nearly 20 years ago has had a Democratic chairman. Most of that time the commission has been made up of two Democrats and one Republican, and this under Republican Presidents who at any time could have changed it. It was not until the present administration came in that there was any indication of partisanship in making up that commission.

President Wilson at once reorganized it, the Republican was turned out, and two new members of the commission put in, although he kept as chairman one admirably qualified for the position. Of course, he put in two Democrats and one Republican—the law would not allow him to put in three Democrats—so that partisanship seems under this administration to apply even to the composition of the Civil Service Commission. And it is suggestive and suspicious that this reorganization of the commission was simultaneous with the Executive order which changed the tenure of all the fourth-class postmasters and forced them all to be examined and obtain their appointment by this Civil Service Commission. That order was generally accepted as a device to get rid of competent Republican postmasters in a large section of the country without an open and flagrant departure from the civil-service practice of the recent Republican Presidents, and we shall watch with interest to see whether the plot is successfully carried out.

But there certainly has never been any unfair partisanship by the commission in favor of Republicans in recent years, because the chairman and a majority of that commission, though appointed and kept in office by Republican Presidents, have been Democrats, and so if 95 per cent of the classified service are Republicans, as asserted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], it can not be because the Civil Service Commission has been unfairly partial to them; and the other alternative suggested by the gentleman from Illinois must be the explanation, that Democrats have not been able to pass the examinations. However, I will admit that I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois that that is the alternative. I think the real explanation is that the gentleman's figures are wrong, for I do not believe that he or anyone else can estimate at all the political faith of the Government employees, though I am quite ready to believe that a great majority of those who have entered by competitive examination and on their merits are Republicans.

It is interesting to me to note the difference between the debate now and the debates on this question when I first came to Congress 20 years ago. Then a majority of Congressmen were not only covertly, but openly and eagerly, in favor of the old patronage system. Many of the leaders of the House on both sides took delight in avowing their scorn for the merit system, and in those days it took some courage for a man on this floor to defend the cause of civil service. To-day those who oppose it generally admit the merit of the system, but assail its administration or give ingenious reasons for exceptions. This change in temper here is, of course, a mere reflection of a change in public opinion. I believe in the last 20 years the people—throughout the North, at least—have become convinced that the system of competitive examinations is a fair and efficient method, and would no longer permit the old system of favoritism and patronage; and consequently to-day the attack is not made in front, as it used to be, by refusing to appropriate for the Civil Service Commission, but it is made by a flank and half-concealed movement like this amendment, where they hope to get all the fruits and advantages of patronage and yet hope that their purpose is so concealed by ambiguous language and ingenious argument that the public will not penetrate their real purpose.

But while Congress was until quite recently hostile to the merit system, every President, from the passage of the act in 1883 until this year, has supported it by word and conduct. We had every reason to suppose that President Wilson would be no exception, and I have no doubt his convictions and beliefs are the same, but apparently his inclination has not been able so far to withstand the stress of political pressure. Appointments have been made with marked disregard of fitness, and this morning's paper tells of a Democratic Congressman being punished for voting against the President's wishes on the tariff bill by having his recommendations for office disregarded.

The President issued the ingenious order about fourth-class postmasters and changed the existing rules in order, as we believe, to oust Republican officeholders; he signed, without any manifestation of disapproval, the bill which turned over the great Internal Revenue Office to the spoilsmen, although President Roosevelt had the courage to veto the census bill because of a spoils provision much less flagrant; and now, if this amendment goes to him and he approves it, he will, I believe, destroy all faith in the sincerity of his civil-service convictions. I trust that this House will not violate the pledges of both the political parties by taking this backward step and adopting this amendment. If it does, I trust the President will condemn it by his veto, as I am sure he will with his judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], but previous to that I will yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I know how absolutely weak I am and how helpless I feel in making a useless protest against this raid which is about to be made upon a fixed and favored American institution. I came to this House about the time that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] appeared to become one of its distinguished Members. We both know that it required some courage, Mr. Speaker, to be for the civil service at that time. It was not then understood. You remember it, sir. We were courageous outside this Chamber, but were filled with fear when the time for the attack on the floor approached. We agreed among ourselves, when the public neither looked nor listened, that we would oppose the enforcement of the civil service by withholding the appropriations for its maintenance; but when the time was reached to make the record here but few of us dared to stand up and defy the American people that which they determined to have for the benefit of American institutions and the whole Government service.

Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with our friends on the other side, and I speak with sincerity in the use of the word, for I feel toward you as I would like to have you feel toward me in your struggle to help those who have helped you. But let me suggest to you—to quote the wise words of the old philosopher who said that all good things were intended to be seen and not possessed—that public office is to be reached through merit, which is the latest decree of the American people. Therefore, if you can work it into the minds of your people that these places of profit which they consider good to have and which belong, as you say, to the Democratic Party because of party success, they shall get by earning them, you will have done the country a great service and one which it will hereafter appreciate. Right here let me say it is positively wrong to attempt to legislate in an hour and a half upon a subject that involves the well-being of the Nation. It is wrong to put upon an appropriation bill an amendment or rider of this importance and rush it through in the dead of night with but little discussion. The country will not stand for either the manner or the result which you expect and have determined to obtain.

How do we know this is right, except in our partisanship and zeal we so declare it? Who says to us that this is good for the country and according to the wishes of the people? Who better informed than we says that your attempt to provide public office for your own will not endanger our Government life and prosperity? Pass this, my friends, if you dare—

Mr. GORDON. Oh, we will pass it all right.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; selfishly, I want you to do it. In this instance I feel like the boy watching the painter on the ladder. I am only afraid that you will not. Pass it, and you will have the time of your life convincing your constituents that you can not pass more such provisions and relieve other departments from the operation of the civil service. So you can. You can offer no good excuse for your refusal. Pass this law to-night—and I think you will—and you will not only give the administrative feature of our Government a great wound that may never be healed, but you will get yourselves into trouble with your own people, for we will not permit you to say that you can not relieve the customhouses and the post offices and all other departments where Republicans are employed, so that Democrats can be substituted for them. If in one instance you can relieve from the operation of the civil service, why can you not do it in another? Mark my words, aside from the damage you do established Government rule, for your own preservation, for your own comfort, you do not want such power as the passage of this amendment will give you. After an experience of many years in this House, with ample opportunity for observation, I am candid in saying that I could not have remained and performed my duty if it had not been for the rules of the civil service. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, among the earliest votes I cast in Congress was one in favor of the civil-service law and the merit system. There was a great deal of sentiment in the country for it at that time. A good many Members of Congress had come in pledged to vote for it. I remember one Democrat who had the courage of his convictions—a rare bird nowadays—the late Sunset Cox, then of New York and formerly of Ohio. He said after the bill had passed that it would not live a year, but Mr. Cox was wrong, as he frequently was, and the bill has grown stronger from that day to this. Once in a while we have seen a man who was bold enough to come out and openly attack the whole system, but they have been very rare. I remember some in the last few years who had the courage and manliness to come out and attack it and say they did not believe in it. Of course there are lots of people who want to sneak around and destroy it, and once in a while we find a man like the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and the gentleman from Kentucky, who come out and who are not afraid to say in their districts that they are in favor of the abolition of the whole thing and want to destroy it, root and branch, but most of you dare not do it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, do not interrupt me. I have only four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. But I will yield the gentleman some of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will answer his question if he will yield me one minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly. The gentleman misstated my position. I did not state and never have stated that I was opposed to the entire system.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the gentleman has not his usual courage upon this question, and I take it all back.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am at least not a hypocrite.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, when this administration came in it was very evident that the boys wanted the jobs, and there was great pressure brought all along the line. Men were taxing themselves and their ingenuity to find out some way to circumvent the civil service. Take, for example, the gentleman who was lately a very popular Member of this House, and who is now at the head of the Post Office Department.

The boys wanted to get at the fourth-class postmasters, and it took the genius of a Burleson to invent a scheme "in the interest of civil-service reform" to get rid of all the fourth-class postmasters then in office and appoint others. How did he do it? Simply by making a provision that the incumbents must go through some sort of a civil-service examination, and if they could not stand it—no matter how long they had been in office, no matter how well they had discharged their duties, no matter how efficient their service had been—they would have to go. All of these things would stand for nothing. They go out of the way and have some sort of a civil service to get one in.

Mr. BUTLER. They select one out of three.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course there are only three eligibles, and they have a chance to select one of the three, and they always get the Democrats that they want, and they always will when they can, because they can take one of the three. They are getting rid of the civil service in the fourth-class postmasters. Oh, you people will get mighty sick of that job within two years. I had fourth-class postmasters in my district to deal with once, and every time an office brought in $50 or $100 there would be two healthy candidates, storekeepers on opposite sides of the street, and each one had behind him a clique about equally divided according to their location, and "the old Harry was to pay," and I had more trouble with one little fourth-class post office, on an average, than in the big towns in my whole district. You will get mighty sick of that job before you get through. You are going a little further, and you passed a tariff bill, and one of the worst provisions of the many bad provisions in that bill, and it would take two weeks to enumerate them all, is one in regard to the appointment of people to collect the income tax.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield the gentleman from New York one minute of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. And that provided for the appointment of these men outside of the civil service; and not content with that—it did not go far enough to suit them—they put in an amendment by which they can get rid of every civil-service man in the internal-revenue department. Then they come in here with this amendment. The gentleman from Georgia is not satisfied, but adds an amendment to the Senate proposition. For fear some guilty man may escape—some Republican—he puts in here “existing regulations applying to bonds required wherever the marshal or the collector shall require a bond,” and that takes in every deputy of both departments. He was not content with getting after those already in office, but he wanted to get after the whole raft of them.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PAYNE. And so, one by one, they tried to get into this civil service and destroy it. Why do you not have the courage of your convictions; why do not you come out and repeat it? You have the power to do it; you have a two-thirds majority in this House; why do not you dare do it? Why do you come here with a subterfuge; why do you come here with hypocrisy? Oh, ye Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, who shall deliver you from the wrath to come? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to say the gentleman in attempting to quote the Bible ought to quote it correctly; that is all.

Mr. MANN. No one over there knows any differently.

Mr. PAYNE. You have got a different kind of Pharisee now; you have to change the language to suit the person.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman ought to learn something about the Bible and courtesy as well. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the short space of time which has been allotted to me by the gentleman from Georgia in amplifying somewhat the remarks which I made in this House this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, those on the other side of the Chamber may criticize Members on this side and charge them with undertaking to break down the civil-service law that is now upon the statute books, but I am satisfied that those charges and those threats will not deter any man on this side of the Chamber from performing his duty as he sees fit to perform it as a Member of this House. I am not against civil service, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, I am for a proper civil service; but I am for a civil service that is a real civil service, and I am not for one that is a farce and a fraud and a contempt in the nostrils of the American people such as the one we have at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it was stated upon the floor of this House this afternoon by some Republican Members in reply to charges from Members on this side that the civil-service laws of the United States had not been enforced by the Republican Party from a partisan and political standpoint, and that no discrimination had been shown in the exercise of the powers of appointment and in the enforcement of the civil-service regulations, and they demanded that we give instances of such discrimination. I can give those instances in one county in my district here to-night.

I have a county which has 5,500 Democratic votes and 1,700 Republican votes, and many of the Republican voters are members of the colored race, who can neither read nor write. And yet, notwithstanding the overwhelming preponderance of the Democratic vote in that one county, out of 31 rural mail carriers I am informed that only 4 of them are Democrats and 27 are Republicans. Now, it can not be true, Mr. Speaker, that in a proportionate voting population of 5,500 Democrats to 1,700 Republicans, 27 out of 31 rural mail carriers would be Republicans unless there were rank discrimination.

Not only that, but in a certain post office a Republican postmaster saw fit to overleap the heads of four Democrats in order to reach the fifth man on the eligible list in order to appoint a Republican a city carrier, instead of a Democrat, who was entitled to the appointment.

You say that the Civil Service Commission has been two Democratic and one Republican. The Civil Service Commission does not make these appointments except upon the recommendations of others. The local postmaster has the right to recommend the appointment of rural mail carriers and the appointment of city carriers and clerks, and the charge can not be laid successfully to the Civil Service Commission that they have in all cases discriminated; but the discrimination has come about by reason of the fact that the local examiner has in every case been a Republican, and the local officer who had the power to recommend the appointment has been a Republican.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was never the intention of the makers of this law, and it was never the intention of the Congress of the United States, that these officers should be shifted about by the President of the United States, one President putting them under the civil service and another putting them out of the civil service and another in return putting them back for political purposes. I do not believe that the President of the United States ought to have the power even to put in or take out of the civil service a certain class of officers as he may see fit to do.

I think if Congress wants any class of officers in this Government to be under the civil service it ought to specify them and say by an authoritative act that certain political positions shall be in the civil service or shall not be in the civil service, and not leave it to the discrimination of one President or another President to take them out or put them in as he chooses.

In the next place, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that deputy marshals should be under the civil service, or the deputy internal-revenue collectors ought to be under the civil service, and I am not making any charge or underhanded threat or committing any midnight assassination of the rules and regulations of the merit system in order to make that statement. There is not a sheriff of any county in the United States who has not the power under the law, at least in the great majority of the States, to name the deputies who shall serve under him in his county. There is not a county clerk, there is not a mayor, there is not an executive officer of any State or any county or any municipality who has not the power under the laws to name the deputies who are directly responsible to him for the performance of their duties. Yet we do not hear any charges of discrimination against members of the municipal boards, sheriffs, county clerks, or probate judges of county courts, or that members of the State administration appointed by the governors of the respective States are guilty of any incompetence, and that they do not perform their duties faithfully, even though they are appointed by the officers in charge of those various departments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that this is true, there are Members of Congress—and I do not doubt their honesty of purpose and I do not impugn their motives, but grant to them the sincerity of purpose that I expect from them in return—but there are Members of Congress and there are some other people in this country who seek to make it appear that if a deputy United States marshal, whose duty it is to go out and arrest people charged with crime under a warrant issued by the district court of the United States, is taken out from under the protection of the civil service, the courts of justice can no longer exist and that the Government itself will go out of business. There are others who pretend to claim that if a deputy revenue collector, whose duties are those of a detective, to run down violators of the revenue laws and to arrest bootleggers and moonshiners, the chief requirement of whom is nerve and grit and courage, is taken out from under the protection of the civil-service law, thereby making it unnecessary for him to answer some questions as to the location of Bangkok or whether Arizona cactus will grow in the Province of Saskatchewan, which have nothing whatever to do with the duties of deputy collectors or deputy United States marshals, no more revenue will be collected, and that incompetence and corruption and neglect of duty will ensue by reason thereof.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, am opposed, as a matter of principle, to life tenure in office, from President down to the smallest officer in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe in a real civil service, but I deny the proposition that the humblest citizen of the United States has no right to aspire to serve the Government in one capacity or another.

We have heard a great deal of criticism of the so-called office seeker in this country since the Democratic administration came into power, but I say to you that there is not a man on the floor of this House to-night who is not an office seeker and has been one for many years. [Applause.] And yet here in this sanctum sanctorum of this Congress such men sit under an assumption of virtue and attempt to criticize every American citizen who desires to hold an office, either as a Congressman or as a district attorney or a United States marshal or a revenue collector or a deputy collector or a cashier or any other officer.

I honor the spirit of the American people in wanting to have a part in the service of their Government. I honor the patriotism which inspires a man, whether he be educated in a great university or grew up under adverse circumstances, to want to serve his country and bear a part in the service of the people of the United States, and I have no sympathy with that ridiculous criticism which has been hurled at every man in the United States who has the ambition and the desire and the courage to ask for an appointment under the Government. Therefore I am in favor of giving the marshals and the revenue collectors the right to name the men who are directly responsible to them, and for the faithful performance of whose duties they must give bond. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just addressed the House [Mr. BARKLEY] apparently does not understand the real principles which underlie the civil-service law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say this to the gentleman, if he gives me the opportunity, that—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER. I can not yield. I have only four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] says that he admires any American citizen who aspires to hold office, and the gentleman, in effect, insinuates that the civil-service law prevents such aspirations. But this is a complete misstatement of the whole intent and purpose of that law, for the spirit of the civil-service law is that every American citizen shall have an equal right with every other American citizen to seek appointment to office. Under that law the son of the poor man has the right to take a civil-service examination, and if he passes the examination with a better average than does the son of the rich man he shall receive the appointment. That law opens the door of opportunity to rich and poor on equal terms and makes merit the test.

But the gentleman's theory of politics is that the millionaire's son and the poor man's son and everybody else in his district aspiring to office shall come to the Congressman to get the office. That is the old spoils system, under which appointments are made not upon the merits of applicants, but merely to serve the purposes of a political boss.

Let me read for the edification of the gentleman something about the conditions in this country under the old spoils system, of which, notwithstanding his positive denials, his argument shows him to be a champion. Here is what Senator Bayard, the distinguished Democrat from Delaware, said in the Senate:

No man obtained an office except he was a violent partisan, and the office was given to him as a reward for party services; and so things went on until the offices generally were filled under that system, which was false and dangerous in the extreme—a system which, as my friend from Ohio said, is absolutely fatal to the integrity of republican institutions, and I care not what party or under what name it may be organized and carried on.

Now, listen to what another equally famous Democrat, Senator Vest, from the State of our distinguished Speaker, said on the floor of the Senate:

When I entered the Senate I became chairman of the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, and for two years I was engaged with the rest of that committee in taking testimony on the subject of civil-service reform. That very great evil exists there can be no sort of question—evils so monstrous, so deadly in their effects, that men of all political parties have come to the conclusion that some remedy must be applied.

And here is the powerful statement made by Gen. Garfield, afterwards President, in debate on this floor:

We press such appointments upon the departments; we crowd the doors; we fill the corridors; Senators and Representatives throng the offices and bureaus until the public business is obstructed; the patience of officers is worn out, and sometimes, for fear of losing their places by our influence, they at last give way and appoint men not because they are fit for their positions but because we ask it.

In an article in the Atlantic Monthly Gen. Garfield declared that—

One-third of the working hours of Senators and Representatives is hardly sufficient to meet the demands made upon them in reference to appointments in office.

The present system * * * impairs the efficiency of the legislators; * * * it degrades the civil service; * * * it repels from the service those high and manly qualities which are so necessary to a pure and efficient administration; and, finally, it debauches the public mind by holding up public office as the reward of mere party zeal.

To reform this service is one of the highest and most imperative duties of statesmanship.

President Grant, speaking of the great evils in 1870 of the spoils system, said in a message:

There is no duty which so much embarrasses the Executive and heads of departments as that of appointment, nor is there any such thankless labor imposed on Senators and Representatives as that of finding places for constituents. The present system does not secure the best men, and often not even fit men, for the public places. The elevation and purification of the civil service of the Government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin is exhausted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has used four minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES].

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to Senate amendment No. 8 for two reasons: First, because it is a rider on an appropriation bill, and I believe there is no more vicious system of legislating than by means of riders; and, second, because it constitutes a return to the old spoils system. I admit that the gentlemen who advocate this amendment have had great provocation for their stand. I admit that the administration of civil-service reform has been vicious and partisan. But I am a believer in the nonpartisan administration of the civil service in a filling of clerical positions with a view solely of competency and efficiency. If civil-service reform had been administered in the spirit as well as the letter of the law, I believe that positions in the service would be held about equally by members of the great parties. That 95 per cent of these positions are held by Republicans is a terrific indictment against the Republicans who have filled these jobs. But that does not alter the fact that character and efficiency rather than partisanship should govern in the selection of clerical positions. The country is interested in results rather than the giving of offices to ward heelers or spoilsmen.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that Democratic workers should have at least an equal chance with Republican workers to serve their country in office, and that they have not had this chance furnishes in itself an ample reason why the Republicans should no longer be entrusted with the making of appointments. But putting this rider on this appropriation bill is no way in which to correct the evils of the Republican administration.

There are two ways in which this unfairness in the division of clerical positions has crept into the civil service. One is by the covering into the service by Executive orders thousands of appointees who have never taken an examination, but whose appointment was due solely to their Republican partisanship, and the other is the unfair marking of examination papers, and more especially the oral examinations, and the unlawful consideration of partisanship in making the selection between the eligibles.

The first way can be easily corrected by a general bill, and if no gentleman with more legislative experience than myself does it I propose to introduce in the regular session a bill throwing open to being filled by examination all civil-service positions in the Government now required to be filled by examination, where the occupants have not been appointed as the result of such examination. I would let these partisan gentlemen take their chances with others who are hungry to serve their country in clerical positions. I would no longer throw around them the protection of the civil-service laws in keeping men in positions who are not as competent as men outside wanting these positions. As to correcting the second of the ways in which the offices have been filled with Republicans, it requires more thought than I have yet been able to give it. But I believe there must be some nonpartisan way to correct even the abuses that have thus crept in; some way in which competent clerks can be kept in while weeding out the incompetents without the appointing official in any way laying himself open to the suspicion of partisanship. Whether this way should be the reexamination of Government employees at stated periods or otherwise I am not prepared at present to say.

I do believe that the whole subject of the civil-service laws should be thoroughly investigated; that rules made for partisan purposes should be eliminated. To show what I mean, let me give a concrete illustration of a rule which I discovered was put in force for a partisan purpose. When President Taft attempted to keep in office all Republican fourth-class postmasters by covering them into the civil service, the vacancies to be filled by examination, a joker was even put in this examination. Applicants were marked on the location in which they proposed to keep the office, and this mark was supposed to be so important that it was multiplied by three. Now here is where the joker came in: The present location of the post office was marked 100, and other locations were marked down in percentage according to their distance from "the present location." Do you not see the advantage this gave the Republican applicants? If you do not, I have merely to remind you that most of these fourth-class offices are in small villages or hamlets. Usually they are found in a country store. Their chief value is to draw the people into that store.

In most of these small villages there is a Republican store with the post office and a Democratic store without it, and this system of marking was devised with the purpose in view of keeping the office in the Republican store. Happily, this rule was so flagrant that, on its being called to his attention, the present Postmaster General abolished it; but that there ever was such a rule shows how Republican partisanship has sought to perpetuate Republicans in office under the guise of civil service. It is such violations of the spirit of civil-service reform which justify in some degree the attacks made on the system.

I believe, however, that the people of this country are in favor of the merit system. I am frank to say that I am thoroughly in favor of a merit system. All three parties have declared in favor of it. And so I would not abolish the reform, but I would reform the reform; and the way to do this is not to insert an ill-considered rider on an appropriation bill, but by an independent bill, carefully considered and debated and passed in Congress on its merits.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. GERRY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this Senate amendment No. 8 because I believe it is an unjustifiable attack upon the civil service. This proviso has a greater scope than first appears from a casual reading. It takes from the classified service not only the deputy marshals and the deputy collectors of internal revenue, but also all of the subordinates that the collectors and deputy marshals may appoint. The Democratic Party has always been the supporter of civil service. Mr. Cleveland was its strong advocate and friend. The Baltimore platform of 1912 contained the following:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party. We favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation, commensurate with the class of work performed, for all officers and employees.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House are trying to make us believe that they are the only supporters of the civil service; that they are moved entirely by altruistic motives. Anybody who has studied this subject at all realizes what hypocrisy this is, for they have so manipulated the rules in the past, when they were in control, that Republican officials have greatly predominated, and they are defending it now because they wish to retain their placemen. I believe that one of the greatest injuries ever done to the civil service was when the fourth-class postmasters were put under it, for it was simply a cloaking of the spoils system under the garment of civil-service reform. But because the Republicans have not kept faith is no reason why the Democrats should not. Two wrongs do not make a right. The country expects more of the Democracy than it does of the Republican Party, and I hope that this Senate amendment will not be agreed to by this House, but that it will place good government before political gain and that merit and ability shall be the standard. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of Senate amendment No. 8. I am in favor of it principally because I am opposed to the whole civil-service propaganda. [Applause.] I am opposed to it because I believe it is hypocritical, insincere, and fraudulent in its every aspect, and, as my friend at my right suggests, damnable. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to it because I believe, with Andrew Jackson, that to the victor belongs the spoils.

I do not believe that any President of these United States can successfully carry into execution his policies unless every agent under him is in line with his policies and believes as he believes. Take it to-day. An eminent Federal official only a few days ago told me that the two stenographers in his office were Republicans; that he could not dictate a letter that had not to be dictated to a Republican. Here we are undertaking to conduct a government upon Democratic lines with Republican agencies to execute them.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a short one if the gentleman will be quick.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman believe in the Democratic platform?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield to have the gentleman read to me from the book which he has in his hand, under the guise of asking a question. I believe in the Democratic platform which declares for Democratic principles, and those principles can not be enforced except by Democrats.

Mr. STEENERSON. For the civil service?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Which principles can not be carried into execution except through Democratic agencies. They can not be executed by Republicans.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman from Minnesota to order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declined to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman yielded once.

The SPEAKER. He yielded for a question and the gentleman undertook to read him a book. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is it out of order to read the Democratic platform in a Democratic House?

The SPEAKER. It is out of order to read a book under the guise of asking a question.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to state that I did not intend to read the book.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to have his words taken down if he desires to deal with them. The gentleman from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I have noticed during my eight years of service in this House that when the gavel was wielded by Mr. Cannon, and partisanship ran riot throughout this country, none of these gentlemen were demanding a close adherence to civil-service reform. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They had everything. They did not ask for anything of this character, but they stood for Republicans in office everywhere and on all occasions.

And they were right in doing so, Mr. Speaker. No matter what party is in power, the members of that party should administer the affairs of the Government. This is a government of parties, and it is folly for any political party to undertake to administer the affairs of government through officials who are opposed to such party, or to carry its policies into execution through the medium of agents who are the bitter enemies of such policies.

If civil service was honestly enforced, it would not result in bettering governmental administration, but it is not honestly and fairly enforced and, in my judgment, it never will be. A graduate of Harvard or Yale might be entirely unfit to fill the office of deputy United States marshal, while the most ignorant of men would be first-class deputies, although they could not stand the examination. The whole crooked, fraudulent civil service should be wiped from the statutes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER].

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to preface what I have to say by the fact that I believe in the merit system, absolutely, and I do not want any Member on this floor to turn and say to me that that is hypocrisy. I do not believe in full what has been attributed to the Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, that if office is a good thing it should be divided, and that if it is a bad thing it is too much to put upon any party or any individual.

There is one department, however, in this city where 437 employees take part in the execution of its work every day of the week. Four hundred and fourteen of those 437 employees are Republicans. The other 23 are near Democrats. I have no objection to the Democratic Party employing officials who are Republicans, if they are meritorious men and can sustain their positions, but I am absolutely and unqualifiedly against a near Democrat, who is simply playing politics by holding a Republican position.

I have in my possession a letter written by a consul of the United States in Switzerland, who states that there is at this time, and has been for several years, an employee of this Government appointed by the Treasury Department who is under the civil service, who has taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, and who has never seen America and whose family have never been here. If civil service is to be extended to the other side of the ocean in that manner, then I for one protest against it. This particular individual I have referred to is a man by the name of Carl Kauffmann. Charges have been brought against him. The consul himself has been trying for some time to convince the Treasury Department of this country that this man is not a proper person to perform the duty of inspector of laces at St. Gall, for the reason that he altered an official certificate under the hand and seal of the consul and filed it with the Treasury Department as a voucher—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to place this letter in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE HON. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DIFENDERFER: I was greatly pleased to receive your favor of the 18th instant, with its assurance that you are moving in the Kaufmann matter.

When I received from President McIlhenny, of the Civil Service Commission, information that "Mr. Kaufmann has the status of a competitive classified employee" (as per his letter of June 12, 1913) I was thunderstruck. How can a foreigner, who never even saw the United States, be given the protection of our American civil-service law? How can such a man consistently take the required oath of office? These questions recur to me continuously. I could understand the thing under the Reynolds-Wilkie régime in the Treasury Department, but can't think a Democratic administration will stand for it, when so many worthy Democrats are kept out in the cold by this same civil-service law. The thing is bad enough were Kaufmann an honest man—which he is not, as I have been endeavoring to convince the department for a year or two past. He altered an official certificate under my hand and seal and filed it in the Treasury Department as a voucher in a bogus furniture sale. I have reported this several times and asked for an investigation, which, by the way, has been promised.

He has acted as a czar here for years; he has terrorized the trade and his record is bad, although he has managed so far to deceive the Treasury officials. When you are calling at the State Department you might take time to read my last report regarding Kaufmann, No. 168, Re St. Gall Treasury Affairs, dated September 4, 1913.

This will give you an idea of the man's methods.

With many good wishes, believe me to be,

Yours, sincerely,

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Metz].

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I will not require the five minutes so kindly yielded to me, but simply desire to state that I am opposed to this amendment. In the first place, as a new man possibly I do not know just what is proper, but it does not appear to me the right thing to include legislation of this character upon an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. A certain amount of money is devoted to certain purposes, provided such and such a thing is done, and that certain thing will remove certain men in the civil service. If these men are incompetent or improperly there, there are other means of getting rid of them. Furthermore, I believe they have been in the civil service and out and in again, and they should not be juggled with any further. If I may be permitted, I will yield back my unexpired time, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back three minutes. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time has the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman only used two minutes.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I think it takes a very courageous man in 1913 to stand up on this floor and say that he is in favor of the 'spoils system, as has been said here to-night. I have noticed this has been argued from three angles. One opposes the merit system because he is opposed to the civil-service reform idea altogether; another opposes it because it is not administered aright, and still another opposes it because he thinks he will have to deal with people who belong to an opposite party to which he belongs. It does not matter in 1913 what is the ground of opposition. It is a step backward, and I am sure that you can not fight against the future. Time is against you. You are bound to lose by such conduct of this House in taking this backward step against the civil-service reform idea. [Applause.] How is it possible for leading Democrats, representing ideas of modern times, in view of what has taken place in the past, to stand in opposition to civil service, when you remember that the only well-regulated civil-service law up to 1883 was introduced by a distinguished Democratic Senator, George H. Pendleton, and passed by a Republican Senate and by a Democratic House and signed by a Republican President? Then how can a Democrat stand up in opposition to the civil service when he remembers that it was upon that theory that Grover Cleveland was elected? Why was it that such men as George William Curtis refused to vote for Mr. Blaine? Why was it that James Russell Lowell refused to vote for Mr. Blaine? Why was it that the mugwumps were organized, and, under the leadership of Carl Schurz and others, voted against Mr. Blaine for Mr. Cleveland? The chief pretext was upon the question of reform in the civil service, and Grover Cleveland came into power upon that issue. He went out of power after having extended the civil service as no President up to that time had extended it.

And when you indict President Taft for doing the same thing before he went out of office you are indicting him for doing what Grover Cleveland did. You applauded Grover Cleveland because of what he did, and we ought to have applauded President Taft for what he did.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. FESS. I can not yield.

The merit system is a part of the organized movement for a better Government; that stands for efficiency and economy in this country. It is only one form of this mighty movement that you see to-day in the cities where the commission form of government is sweeping the land, and in the States which are insisting upon the short ballot, as well as in different municipalities, where no attention is paid in the matter of administration whether the man is a Republican, whether he is a Democrat, or whether he is a "Bull Moose." What difference should it make to me whether an administrative officer is voting with me or not? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, from the very first days of the Republic the question of removals has been before the people. Washington laid down the principle, naming certain conditions to be considered.

Geography, fitness, and past service were especially specified in making appointments, but this specification rather went to appointments than to removals.

Jefferson was the first President to emphasize the principle of removal. He exercised his power in 142 removals, all told. He stood upon the basis that as the victor in a contest decided by the ballot he would be held responsible, and was therefore justified in removing anyone for cause, whether political or otherwise, if it became necessary to do so for the sake of carrying out his policy. Removal was necessary, since none resign and few die.

But the spoils system as we know it to-day was not practiced prior to Jackson's era. He proceeded upon the principles expressed by Marcy, of New York, that the spoils of office belong to the victors, and removed most of the employees holding what would be considered political positions. From that day until the eighties little was done by party or individual to correct the evil.

It had been thoroughly established by the end of Jackson's time and adopted by Van Buren. It had been followed by all the Presidents down to the close of the Civil War with only here and there an effective voice of opposition heard against it.

Seward wrote a friend that the country seems to be divided into two general classes, and both are on the move, one class to California in search of gold and the other to Washington in search of office.

From the close of the war to 1883 patronage stimulated political activity into a genuine struggle, with spasmodic efforts of individuals and associations to reform it. Its effects were visibly noted upon the heads of the administration.

Charles Sumner was one of the first statesmen to make an effective attack. As early as 1864 he introduced a bill to provide for the "greater efficiency in the civil service." Four years later Thomas Jenckes, of Rhode Island, succeeded in having a committee report on the civil service of this and other countries. This is the real beginning of the civil-service reform movement.

This committee reported in favor of reform, first, for greater efficiency in the service, and, secondly, relief of the President and the heads of departments from pressure of office seekers.

Gen. Grant gave the movement his approval and actual aid. In his second annual message he recommended it to cover not only the tenure of office, but to regulate the matter of removals. Later he placed George William Curtis, the famous civil-service reformer, at the head of a commission of seven to report on measures to be adopted to secure a better service. And while the proposed law was attached as a rider to an appropriation bill, President Grant announced that if Congress did not act favorably he would interpret the act as unfriendly to the proposed reform and he would abandon further efforts, except to require competitive examinations to secure fitness. By this time the advocates were strong enough to make demands. Many of them joined the Liberal Republican movement in 1872. The platform of this party is the first national pronouncement upon the issue. The platform declared that—

The civil service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition and selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions and breeds demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of republican government.

The regular Republican Party adopted a similar plank in the same campaign.

President Hayes took a decided stand in favor of the reform. Two incidents are historic, viz: The appointment of Carl Schurz, the famous civil-service reformer, as Secretary of the Interior, and the commissioning of Dorman B. Eaton, sometimes known as the father of civil-service reform, to write a history of the movement, extending to European countries. From this on the movement gained strength. Under this administration competitive examinations were introduced to determine the appointment in the New York customhouse, and in 1880 the same rule was applied to the New York post office. The agitation by the early eighties had reached the plan of a real propaganda. The papers and magazines were filled, as well as books were written, upon the subject. Many civil-service reform associations, such as the New York Civil Service Reform Association, were organized. The national league was formed in 1881, headed by George William Curtis. This was the direct outgrowth of the assassination of President Garfield. The agitation hitherto of a fugitive nature now takes a legal aspect. Eaton framed a law which was presented in 1881 by George H. Pendleton, an Ohio Democrat. It was passed in 1883 by a Republican Senate and concurred in by the Democratic House and signed by President Arthur.

This is the first enactment the main features of which are now in operation. Henceforth civil-service reform has been a plank in every party platform of the leading parties down to the present time. The campaign of 1884 was made by the Democrats upon a platform of reform, chief of which, next to the tariff, was civil service. The defection among Republican leaders, which gave the election to Cleveland, grew out of the civil service. It was upon this issue, as I said before, that Curtis, Schurz, Beecher, and many other life-long Republicans declined to vote for the Republican candidate and supported Cleveland.

These same independent voters were greatly disturbed to see Cleveland remove 90 per cent of the presidential officers in a little over a year's time, 68 per cent of the unclassified employees of the Interior Department, and all the fourth-class postmasters. However, before leaving office in 1889 he covered the railroad mail service with the protection of the civil-service regulation. In the succeeding administration of Harrison the closing act of his predecessor came in for attack upon the ground of insincerity toward the merit system. At the close of the second administration of Cleveland in January, two months before he left office, he placed the employees of the President under the civil-service regulations. Under McKinley, in 1899, an order was issued that removed nearly 4,000 places from the classified service, with some changes in the rules for transfers and reinstatements.

President Roosevelt extended the civil service to cover the employees in the customhouses.

President Taft took a decided stand upon the merit system. In 1911 over 4,000 employees were added. Later about 37,000 all told. Taft included fourth-class postmasters.

In September, 1911, President Taft said at Detroit:

They have charged me with using patronage to accomplish something. If I have I have not been conscious of it, but I challenge the men who make the charge to come forward and join with me in legislation which will enable me to put every local officer, be he postmaster, internal-revenue collector, customs collector, or anybody else filling an office in the United States in any of the States of the Union, under the classified civil service.

If I had the making of the laws the first thing I would do would be to include in the civil service every collector, deputy collector, and everybody connected with the internal-revenue system, and put the whole service on a nonpartisan basis.

I know it would be a source of economy. I know it would give the President a great deal more time to devote to other necessities. I know it would save a great many Congressmen their seats, and I know it would tend to evoke the public service.

The movement has not been confined to the Nation, but has spread to the States and cities. Even by 1910, 6 States had made it the law. Over 200 cities, a score of counties, 7 villages, or 250 political divisions in all, had adopted the merit system. Since that date the Ohio constitutional convention adopted it for State, county, and municipality with little opposition.

The wonderful movement for commission government in cities that has swept the country within the last half-dozen years is based upon the application of civil-service classification in all appointive officers.

The fundamental grounds for the short ballot, in which movement President Wilson is so prominent, is based entirely upon a sincere regard for the principles of civil service upon the merit system. The national mind for the past decade has been running against the corrupt spoils system. No louder protests were offered than those by the Democrats.

Says the Philadelphia Ledger, referring to Cleveland's position:

There was a man at the head of the Democratic Party, now nearly 30 years ago, who spoke with no uncertain sound against such corruption in politics. His name was Grover Cleveland, and although dead he yet speaketh. In the quotations which are made from his letters and public papers it would seem that he has shown the way to honest men of all parties, and particularly to honest men in his own party.

When mayor of Buffalo, to the New York Civil Service Reform Association, October 28, 1882:

"When contests between parties are waged for the purpose of securing places for professional politicians of high or low degree whose only recommendation for appointment is their supposed ability to do partisan service, the people are apt to be defrauded by the displacement of tried and faithful servants, well able to perform the duties for which they are paid with the people's money and the substitution of those who are unfit and incompetent."

From letter accepting the Democratic nomination for governor of New York, October, 1882:

"Subordinates in public place should be selected and retained for their efficiency and not because they may be used to accomplish partisan ends."

From speech at unveiling of Garfield statue in Washington, May 12, 1887:

"If our watchfulness against the dangers of a mad chase after partisan spoils be quickened, the dedication of this statue to the people of the United States will not be in vain."

From speech at reception given by the Democratic Club in New York, April 27, 1889:

"Any body of men that would associate themselves together, proclaiming openly that their purpose was supremacy in government, with the sole intent of distributing offices and the spoils of victory among their associates, would be treated with ridicule and scorn. * * * When high party aims and professions are lost sight of and abandoned and the interests of officeholding and personal pelf are all that remain to inspire party activity, not only is the support expected from patriotic people forfeited but the elements of cohesion and of effective and lasting political strength are gone."

From the first annual message to Congress in December, 1885:

"The allurements of an immense number of offices and places exhibited to the voters of the land and the promise of their bestowal in recognition of partisan activity debase the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughtful and deliberate character."

In the light of these utterances of the last Democratic incumbent of the Presidency, the numerous professions of Democratic statesmen, the quadrennial pronouncement of Democratic platforms since the eighties, what should be thought of this amendment to reverse the policy of merit in the interest of the spoils hunter?

Under date of September 8 the Philadelphia Ledger, a Democratic journal, says:

DEMOCRATIC SCRAMBLE.

This incident acquires special point just now because of the utterly shameless course of the Democratic caucus at the Capitol in adopting a resolution that the committee on organization of the House "shall not allow any Republican to hold any position which should be included in Democratic patronage, no matter how long he may have served." And this resolution, offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida, was adopted after only a few feeble protests from a handful of the "truly loil." It is a shame and a reproach to the party in power, and discovers as nothing else could the true intent of the majority on the inside and the beggars at the door of patronage.

Several days ago there was a discussion in the Senate on the question of suspending the civil-service rules so as to admit a shoal of incompetents into the Government service, because they were Democrats and could be used in political service. The air is filled with the odor of spoils. It is the offices, always the offices; a clean sweep of Republicans without regard to fitness or faithful performance of duty, to make room at the public trough for the political friends of Congressmen and Senators.

Doorkeepers and janitors, old and experienced public servants, however humble their station or small their pay, must give way because the spoilsmen insist that they must have their henchmen rewarded, not for public service but for political favor.

The Fairplay Democratic Association insists that the colored employees of the Government shall be turned out on account of their color, and now the Democratic caucus declares it to be the policy of the party that there shall be a clean sweep of Republican place holders on account of their politics. And no firm voice of leadership or authority or high statesmanship has yet spoken a word in public protest against this orgy of office brokers and office seekers.

There has been nothing more disgraceful than the scramble for offices at Washington since the change in administration; nothing more out of keeping with the professions of the party in power; nothing, it is believed, that has caused the President more distress, for he must see, as other clear-eyed men see, that the Democratic victory last November was not worth winning if it meant only, or in appreciable degree, the distribution of offices. Some of the Congressmen talk about "my share of the patronage," "my offices," my doorkeepers, and pages, and janitors, and postmasters, and the rest. It is a shame that such things can be.

The defense of this policy of reversal is placed upon grounds similar to those that have gone before.

Alleged objections to the classified-service regulation are not serious. While there seems to be some ground for the argument, it is not conclusive against the reform in our civil service.

One class of objectors favors the spoils system because the offices should be open to every citizen—a democratic principle. These denounce the classified service on the ground that it limits ambition to serve the country.

Of course no one would seriously make such a contention—that efficiency in service which by competitive examination retains the most efficient in the service is closing the door to any aspirant who is prepared to compete for the place. It does close the door, however, to the unfit, the political huckster, the party tool whose only claim to appointment is his party services, clean or otherwise.

Another objection is that the present system produces arrogance on the part of the employee. The system places him upon an independent plane, and he refuses to respect the wishes of his superior. There is some truth in this claim, but the real question of importance here is whether such independent conduct is not an advantage rather than a detriment to the service. In some cases it would be, while in others not. However, this objection is certainly not conclusive against the merit system in favor of the spoils system.

Another objection urged is that the present plan is inferior on the ground that the chief can know the needs of the office and the fitness of a candidate better than an examining board under the direction of the Civil Service Commission. There is positively no argument in this contention. It is begging the question. It is simply saying the spoils system is superior to the merit system because it is so.

A second objection on this score is that most frequently the examination is not representative, does not take on the character of testing which is designed to secure the most effective servant. If this be true, the error is of easy correction and does not necessarily go against the merit system.

A third objection heard on this phase is that the applicant under competitive system is likely to come fresh from high school or college, familiar with questions, but not adapted to the character of service he seeks, while his competitor may be the most devoted and competent official in the line of service, but owing to his habits of life, not adapted to study, is incapable of making as creditable a test as his less competent competitor fresh from the study room.

There is some argument in this position, but it is not sufficient to abandon the merit system.

The argument most often heard, pressed with greatest vigor, is that the merit system is not workable on merit lines as now administered. This charge is weak upon several grounds. First, if the law is not sincerely administered, it is not the fault of the principle, but of the administration of it. The law or principle should not be attacked, but the manner of its application. We do not repeal all criminal law because in its application we do not exterminate crime.

This charge must fall in the light of the character of our National Civil Service Commissions. No one can seriously charge these men of stultifying their high trust where there is no occasion for it.

It is always made by the fellow who is out beyond the stalls who desires to break within the inclosure. It is totally indefensible and must react upon the party that ignores the widespread demand for service of efficiency and economy rather than that of partisan fealty.

Mr. Speaker, the spoils system, to which it is now proposed to return, is the one indefensible practice against which the conscience of our people has been battling for a half century. To Democrats and Republicans alike it is the one feature of Jackson's presidential career that both supporter and opponent never refer save with an apology. From that date to this the practice of regarding the offices of the Republic as so much stock in trade, to be transferred upon consideration of partisan service rendered, has been the chief point of attack by thinkers and writers in both America and Europe. It proceeds upon the basis that public office is for public plunder and not a public trust. We hear it stated upon this floor, and we can not help wondering at the baldness of expression of some Members who have torn off the mask of deception, usually so common in debate on the subject, that the offices should be parceled out as spoils to be distributed among the party heelers. At least such advocates should be respected for their frankness in admitting the full meaning of this Senate amendment. Their statements stand in striking contrast with professions of other Members, who argue that this amendment is not an assault upon the merit system. They attempt to shield themselves against the shafts of an aroused public conscience, which they fear, by the insipid and futile pretension that the law in the past has not been administered in the interest of a wise public service. The folly of such pretensions is apparent. If that is their only objection, these political pie servers should crave this opportunity to show that law can be administered in the spirit of the enactment. Because a principle of law or administration has not been carried out in practice is no justifiable argument against the wisdom of the principle. If these detractors are sincere in these charges against President Taft's order enlarging the scope of the classified service, they would seek it as a rare opportunity to prove their charge by enforcing the regulation in keeping the merit system.

No; this amendment, which removes nearly 2,000 employees from the classified service and places them as so much stock in the political market, to be struck off to the highest bidder, goes beyond the classes specified. In this case, as in all law-making, it is not so much what is expressed as what is implied by the enactment. While the expression is limited to deputy collectors and marshals, the sweeping implication is in the following words of the amendment, to wit:

And the officer requiring said bond shall have power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and his successor at his discretion without regard to the act, amendments, rules, or regulations aforesaid.

There can be no doubt as to the purpose of this act and the extent of the power it carries. Members have frankly admitted, indeed they have gleefully asserted, that civil service based upon the merit system must be reversed in order that the subordinate officers may be swept out of the way for the hungry horde that are in waiting.

While I have never taken seriously the professions of Democratic politicians of this devotion to the principle of civil service based upon merit, as expressed in every platform, I have always recognized these professions, so far as the practical politician goes, as one of the planks upon which an opposing party hoped to walk into power; yet, in the light of the Pendleton Commission, the program of the "Reform President," Cleveland, the character of the campaign of the Mugwumps, led by Curtis, Lowell, Beecher, Schurz, and others, the advanced position taken by Cleveland at the close of his second term, which covered these very officers you now propose to expose with the protection of the classified service, the bitter and relentless attacks the Democratic Party made upon McKinley for reversing the order, all this so recent and so prominent before friend and foe, this assault upon the very system upon which you rode into power in 1884 only indicates the extent to which men will submit to the wishes of the sordid elements in our body politic.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to notice that if this amendment is passed the appropriations proposed for the Civil Service Commission can be granted only on condition that a good deal of the work of the Civil Service Commission is to be broken down. They ask for appropriations in connection with the examination of fourth-class postmasters. Under the language of the proposed amendment they get that appropriation provided the reform of the civil service already in operation as to collectors of internal revenue and United States marshals shall be given up. After a long and somewhat involved sentence, which can not be construed on a hasty reading, we come to the real meat in the coconut. It has been said here two or three times that this provision which removes certain appointments from the requirements of the civil-service law will apply only to those persons who occupy confidential positions, and it is argued that the collectors of internal revenue and the United States marshals ought to have the right to appoint their immediate subordinates, without regard to the requirements of that law.

But it is not their immediate subordinates alone that are covered by this provision. Let me read the very plain language of the last part of the amendment:

The officer requiring said bond shall have power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and appoint his successor at his discretion without regard to the act, amendments, rules, or regulations aforesaid.

Mark that phrase, "any subordinate officer or employee."

Now, who are some of the subordinate officers and employees of an internal-revenue collector whose appointments may be revoked and whose successors may be appointed without regard to the requirements of the civil-service law? Only the deputy who gives bonds? Why, it would include the whole force—the clerks, the stamp clerks, the assistant clerks, the telephone operators, the storekeepers, the gaugers, the overseers of storekeepers and gaugers. In the larger cities there are suboffices of the internal-revenue collector which have their chief clerks, and assistant clerks, and stenographers, and typewriters, and these are all subordinate officers or employees, who, if this amendment passes, may be thrown out, and whose successors may be appointed without regard to the civil-service law. That is the very plain language of the last four lines of the amendment found on page 3.

And if we would take up the officers and employees subordinate to the United States marshal we would find that this amendment attacks and throws into disorder the whole civil service in two great departments—all the subordinate officers and employees under the internal-revenue collectors and all the subordinates and employees under the United States marshals.

Now, let it not be said, as it has been said heretofore, that the amendment applies only to the immediate subordinates and confidential appointments of the collectors and marshals. It applies to all subordinates and employees in both offices, as the language of the amendment, already quoted above, very plainly shows.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in a few words I want to say that I am going to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia in his motion to concur in the Senate amendment. A great many arguments have been made on that side of the House this evening, some extending sympathy to us and saying that we are going to get into trouble if we adopt this amendment.

Now, so far as one is concerned, I am perfectly willing to assume the trouble. I am in favor of an honest civil-service law. But the trouble is, gentlemen, you have not administered it aright.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] said it certainly took courage for a man to stand on this side and say that he is to-day in favor of abandoning the civil-service law. I want to say to him in return that it certainly took courage from the gentleman's party to absolutely pollute and destroy this law. How many Democratic rural-route carriers are in your district? How many Democratic fourth-class postmasters are in your district? How many Democratic officeholders are in your district to-day? No wonder you are "hollering."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Payne] takes a fall at this proposed amendment. I wonder how many Democratic officeholders there are in his district, how many Democratic mail carriers?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? I will answer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. No; I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COX. I can not yield. I relate circumstances, gentlemen, in my own State. I heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Townner] to-day challenge this side of the House for specific information. I want to say to you that I have got it, and I can lay it down on the desk of the Civil Service Commission in Washington City, if you want to see it, and I have laid it there. I investigated the conditions in my own State last winter. There we have 92 counties. I got a report from 81 of those counties, and out of 2,100 rural-route carriers there was less than 5 per cent of them Democrats; there was less than 4 per cent of the fourth-class postmasters who were Democrats in the 81 counties that I got a report from. How do you account for it, gentlemen? Oh, the Civil Service Commission upholds it, you say.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. No; I can not yield. I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COX. Now that you are out of power, you oppose a change in the present system. You do not stand the test. A year ago 50,000 Federal officeholders were turned into the civil service by your President.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Payne] took Mr. Burleson to task because he says there is some kind of an examination that we are required to hold.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman from Georgia yield to me a few minutes more?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not; I am sorry.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Ragsdale].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Ragsdale] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I am from the South, and being from the South I want to tell you Republicans that your actions in the past, if nothing else, make almost every decent man down there against the civil service.

I am for this amendment because of the manner in which you have treated our people, because you have absolutely ignored the real civil service that you promised to give. In a Government building in my town there is not a single employee under the civil service who is not a negro. There are not 200 Republican votes in my county, and practically every civil-service job there, as well as every civil-service job in my district that you can command, has gone to the negro race.

Why? Did you expect votes in the general election? No.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Burke] knows you did not, and you did not have the manhood in your Republican convention to deny them the vote. You tried to take a great dragnet and go through the country and get a great horde of these "black voters," as you call them, and take them to your Republican convention and pay for their work with your dirty money and your civil-service jobs. You know it. Oh, yes; I remember distinctly the remainder of the quotation that the gentleman from New York omitted when he tried to quote from the Bible and referred to us as scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites, and I now finish that quotation and say to your side and party, "Oh, ye generation of vipers!" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I accept the amendment and apply it to the gentleman himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Oh, no; you have earned it. Keep it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, down in my part of the country we people are against civil service because it is a stench. It is hypocrisy. You do not have the decency, with the Republicans in office, to even try to carry it out.

I am against it from top to bottom. If I had my way, I would blot it off the statute books and turn Republicans out of office, because the people of America have spoken at the polls and the Democrats are entitled to the reward of their labors. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Stevens].

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I am a Democrat from the Northland. I have a few remarks to make to my brethren from the Southland. I beg of them not to be carried away and have their judgment overturned by the local conditions in the South. I realize that the civil-service law has not been honestly enforced by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I realize that you have had Republican officeholders put upon you who were not competent, men who were offensive and distasteful to the people of the South. I sympathize with you in your desire to get rid of these Republican Federal officeholders, but it is not necessary for you to break down the civil-service law, as this Senate amendment will do, to bring about that result. [Applause.] You have only to carry out the promises of the Democratic platform and enforce the present civil-service law honestly and rigidly, and you can get decent, competent officeholders in the South. If you can not do it, then reorganize the law.

There is a great difference between the order issued by Mr. Taft putting the fourth-class postmasters under the civil-service law and the order issued by President Roosevelt eight years ago putting the deputy marshals and deputy collectors under the civil service. Mr. Taft's order protected and covered for the period of their natural lives every man who held a fourth-class office. The deputy marshals' and deputy collectors' terms of office expire when the term of the superior officer expires, and every Democratic marshal in the South or the North or the East or the West and every Democratic collector of internal revenue has a right under the law to appoint every deputy marshal and deputy collector. The only restriction upon his power of appointment is that he must make that appointment from a list of men who have taken the civil-service examination and have passed high enough to be on the eligible list. I would rather have that restriction in the law for the benefit of the party and my own personal benefit than to have the deputy marshals and deputy collectors appointed, not by the superior officer looking for competent men, but appointed by the political man who got the superior officer his job.

There are many men here who believe, and I think honestly believe, that these deputies ought to be appointed by the superior officer, because they are responsible to him; but there are a few men here so innocent as to believe that the United States marshals, or the United States revenue collectors, are going to appoint their own deputies. They will not do it in the State of New Hampshire, even if this provision goes through.

Mr. BARTLETT. Who will appoint them?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I may appoint them, or some of them. There are some things I would rather see than to see my friends get an office. I would rather see the Democratic Party keep its pledges that it has made for 30 years to the American people and uphold and sustain the civil service.

Mr. BROCKSON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire yield to the gentleman from Delaware?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. BROCKSON. If the gentleman from New Hampshire has the appointment of the deputy collectors of internal revenue and the deputy marshals, will he appoint competent men?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I will appoint competent men; yes.

Mr. BROCKSON. Then why have the civil-service law if you will appoint competent men?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The gentleman from Delaware knows as well as I do that when appointments are made under the spoils system, that while we all want competent men, the first dominant reason why we recommend a man is because he has rendered efficient service to the Democratic Party. Now, let me read to the gentleman the plank in the Democratic platform of 1912.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Not until I have answered the gentleman from Delaware. I will read this plank in the platform:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party.

Mr. BROCKSON. Will the gentleman read the rest of it?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

We favor a reorganization of the civil service with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed for all officers and employees.

This is not a reorganization of it. It is a destruction of it. [Applause.]

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. BROCKSON. The gentleman said that he would appoint competent officers?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. BROCKSON. Is it any objection that a man has done work for his party, if he be competent?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. No; but let me say this to the gentleman: If he is opposed to the civil-service system, if he is in favor of the spoils system as applied to the purely administrative offices of this Government, I do not propose to waste one moment's time in discussion with him, because he is out of line with his party platform for the last 30 years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the country is to be congratulated upon the sudden appearance in this Chamber of two great civil-service reformers: I refer, of course, to Civil Service Reformer SERENO E. PAYNE and Civil Service Reformer JAMES MANN. It might be well to bear in mind, however, that these gentlemen have only decided to reform the civil service since the Republican Party went out of power. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give the House just a little of my own experience with respect to the conduct of our Republican friends in reforming this service.

About 1901 we began the great work of installing the Rural Free Delivery Service. In the beginning rural carriers were appointed upon the recommendation of Members and Senators. Later on they were appointed in a different manner entirely. While they were being appointed upon the recommendation of Members and Senators I had a friendly agreement with a distinguished Republican Senator from my State to divide these places in the district I represent equally between that Senator and myself. We got along very nicely with that agreement, and I honestly believe that the carriers we recommended have given as good service as any who have been appointed since. Then Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. MANN decided to reform the civil service and make it apply to rural carriers. Within a few months after it was decided to extend free rural delivery service in the Nation the original manner of appointing carriers was changed.

It was decided to appoint them in accordance with civil-service rules and regulations, and from that day until the last hour of Mr. Taft's term of office I was not able to secure the appointment of a single Democratic carrier. Of course we had "examinations" conducted by Republican inspectors, but I do not recall a single instance where a Democrat was appointed, no matter how many stood, where a Republican with any education at all wanted the place and stood the examination. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this was not accidental. It was so notoriously true that no Democrat could get one of these places that many of them ceased to try. I say the result could not have been accidental, for down in my country we Democrats as a rule are as well educated as our Republican adversaries. Indeed, I think I may say as a rule we are somewhat better educated and better fitted to stand any sort of examination for the public service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While all this was going on, so far as I recall, there was never a word of protest or criticism from either of the great reformers named.

Yes, Mr. Taft was a great civil-service reformer. How did he proceed with this great work? When he saw certain defeat staring him in the face he decided to reform this service by "covering in" more than 30,000 fourth-class postmasters. And how were these postmasters appointed? Down in my country if a Democratic sorehead left our ranks and joined the Republican Party, he stood a mighty good chance to get the post office if the leaders of that party thought well of his partisan services. If he abused Democratic leaders, if he confessed himself guilty of frauds while a Democrat, and made himself generally notorious, his almost certain reward was the nearest fourth-class office. Why, Mr. Speaker, some of these officials are utterly incompetent. I can myself name several who can hardly read and write. The leaders of the Republican Party would move these Democratic renegades hither and thither to make them eligible for appointment.

With almost no exceptions they were appointed purely for partisan service. Few of them are as competent as these officials should be, and some of them are men without character. Now, Mr. Speaker, during the last days of Mr. Taft's administration he proceeded to reform (?) the civil service by issuing an order keeping these people in office for life. Think of that, if you please. Without examination thirty-odd thousand officials put in and kept in office solely for party service, reappointed for life, and this in the name of civil-service reform. Nobody heard a word from Mr. PAYNE or Mr. MANN when this was done. That order of Mr. Taft was all right. It was "in furtherance of the merit system," as one of your Republican leaders claimed this morning. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

O Mr. Speaker, it is enough to make one sick—all this Republican furor in behalf of civil service. If we appoint some decent fellow because he is a Democrat and a man of character, we violate the merit system, but when you Republicans try to keep in office for life thirty-odd thousand partisan postmasters, that is "in furtherance of the merit system." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, surely we have had enough of hypocrisy for one debate. You Republicans will hardly be able to fool the people into believing that you are sincere in your civil-service professions. When you were in you debauched that system under the leadership of Mr. Taft, your President. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There may be real sincere civil-service reformers in this Nation, but they will hardly be found in the ranks of the stand-pat Republican Party in this Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, several months ago at the other end of the Capitol a distinguished Senator, in speaking of his party associates, said:

The wild asses of the desert are athirst, and hungry. They have broken into the green corn.

The trouble is that the opening through which they entered the green corn does not seem to be wide enough to suit some of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House. They want to tear down the civil-service wall entirely, but they have not the courage to try directly to repeal the laws creating and extending the merit system. So they have added this provision regarding deputy collectors of the internal revenue and deputy marshals to this deficiency bill in order that it may be used as an entering wedge wherewith to upset the entire structure of the classified service of this Government.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] hit the nail squarely on the head when he said that it was the pressure from home on those who favor the amendment that brought about the effort to pass this legislation. For 16 years you on the Democratic side have been outside the inclosure which surrounds the green corn. The boys at home have been saying to you, "For years and years we have supported you in your candidacy. We have not had a job heretofore because you were in the minority. Now that you are in the majority, we demand of you that you give us the jobs."

SEVERAL MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). That is right.

Mr. KAHN. Of course that is right from your standpoint. I am glad you admit it; but the American people will not stand for this attack upon the merit system. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Oh, you gentlemen may laugh—

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I do not. I decline to yield. You gentlemen may laugh; but your laughter will turn to a sickening smile when the American people can be heard from upon this subject. About one-third of the appointees in the marshals' offices and in the collector of internal revenue offices have passed the civil-service examinations since the ægis of the civil-service laws and regulations was thrown over the employees of those offices.

You desire to break down the system and put your political henchmen into the offices. You have referred to the right of the superior officer to surround himself in the confidential positions with men of his selection. That is pure hypocrisy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] pointed out the joker in this thing. The last lines of the section read:

And the officer requiring such bond shall have power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and to appoint his successor, at his discretion, without regard to the act, amendments, or regulations aforesaid.

Under that provision the superior officer can discharge his messenger; he can discharge his typewriter; he can discharge everybody who is in the office, even to the unfortunate charwoman.

SEVERAL MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). That is what we want.

Mr. KAHN. Of course you gentlemen on the Democratic side want to do that. You are ready and willing and anxious to go back on the civil-service plank of the Democratic platform. That plank, according to your attitude this evening, was simply bait to catch suckers at the election of 1912. But the people have found you out, as you will learn to your sorrow. I know that many of you are under severe pressure from home, but the assault which you are making upon the civil-service system of the United States will be resented by the voters of this country when you again go to the polls appealing for the votes of the American electorate.

Much has been said during this debate about the order of President Taft extending civil service over 30,000 fourth-class postmasters. If that order was wrong, why did not the present President revoke the order? By failing to revoke it he gave it his tacit approval. And if the present occupant of the White House will stand by his guns, if he will adhere to the principles he espoused when he was an honored member of the Civil Service Reform League, he will promptly return this bill with a veto message in case you gentlemen of the majority succeed in your efforts to rape the civil-service system of our Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to the gentlemen on this side of the House who are so greatly concerned about the civil service. Nobody is assailing the civil service. Nobody is proposing by the legislation now pending to destroy the civil service. It has been customary from time to time, by legislative enactment, to provide that certain officials should be selected outside of the civil service.

When we passed the oleomargarine law it was specifically provided that the force to carry into effect provisions of the law should be selected without regard to the civil service. When we passed the denatured-alcohol bill the law carried in its body a provision that the force to carry into effect its provisions should be selected without regard to the civil service. When we passed the Payne-Aldrich bill the corporation-tax section provided that the force for the collection of that tax should be selected outside of the civil service. Now, to-night, when it is proposed by legislation to except a small class of public officers from the civil service, men who must be employed on account of their tact, on account of a peculiar ability that can not be determined by an examination, you raise your hands in hypocritical protest that you think it is an assault, and an unjustifiable assault, upon the civil service. You know that it is not true. In the Sixty-second Congress, when the sundry civil bill came back from the Senate with a provision in it carrying $300,000 to expedite the pension claims under the Sherwood law and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Cannon, moved to concur in the Senate amendment, every Republican on that side of the House except the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And that appropriation was to employ a force outside the civil service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are substantially 450,000 persons in the classified service. It is idle and preposterous to say that legislation that takes a few hundred employees from the civil service is an assault or destruction of the system.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this Senate amendment, because I believe that every United States marshal ought to be permitted to appoint his own deputies and also that every collector of internal revenue, who is responsible to the Government and gives bond for the faithful discharge of the duties of that office, either by himself or his deputies, should have the right to select his deputies.

And I believe in the merit system, too. I want it distinctly understood, however, that I do not believe in this bastard system that has been in force in this country as administered by the Republican administrations of the last 16 years. I say it is a farce and a fraud. Gentlemen on the other side come here to-night weeping bitter tears over the stabbing of the civil service. "Liberty lies bleeding in the streets!"

I wonder what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said when President McKinley made an Executive order providing for the same thing this amendment does? We did not hear him protest then. Mr. McKinley revoked the civil-service order made by President Cleveland that put these men under the civil service, and they stuffed all the offices with Republicans, and then Roosevelt extended it over them again. Somebody produced figures in the House here to-day to prove that 95 per cent of these deputies were Republicans. So far as deputy United States marshals are concerned, 100 per cent of them are Republicans.

I defy any man on the floor of this House to name one chief assistant United States marshal in the United States to-day who is not a Republican. Give us his address! You can not name one! Of course not. The deputy United States marshal of the district in which I live was appointed under this civil-service rule, as they call it. He took the examination, and he failed ignominiously. They sent down here to Washington and got a special dispensation, took it back there, and gave him a secret examination; and he is there yet. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Of course, it makes a great difference whose ox is gored. I admit that. I am under no delusion about the political potency and power of patronage. I think it is a liability and not an asset, but that does not require me to sit here and listen to these hypocritical speeches from the other side of the House without saying anything. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As a mere matter of spoils I would not support this amendment for a minute, but I say that any man who is big enough and broad enough to represent the Government of the United States as a United States marshal or as a collector of internal revenue ought to have the right to select the men that he intrusts with the discharge of the official duties for which he is responsible. Now, that is my position.

We have a strange combination here of Tammany and the Republicans defending the civil-service law. Ye gods! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is about the right time for some one from the city of New York to rise and reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon], who has just taken his seat, in his untruthful charge against the Democratic organization in the city of New York. I deny the charge he makes; while we are ready to admit that the administration of the civil-service law in the past has been rather of a partisan and one-sided character. If so, and I think no one will deny it, two wrongs do not make a right. I want to place myself squarely upon the Democratic national platforms for the past nine years and ask my friend from Ohio, who has just sat down, if, as a Democrat, he is ready to stand upon those platforms?

Now, I am opposed to these amendments, because I believe it would be radically wrong to adopt them. I believe first that the system of placing riders of this character upon appropriation bills is radically wrong. Never in my nearly 10 years of service here have I voted for any rider placed upon an appropriation bill. I believe they ought to be placed before this House upon their merits and not brought in in this manner. Therefore, for that reason, if no other, I shall oppose these amendments.

Now, as to the Democratic platforms. In the first place, back in 1904, a good many years ago—

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question before he touches that?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did not the gentleman vote for the sundry civil bill here this session?

Mr. GOULDEN. No; I think not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did the gentleman vote against it?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; I think I did. That is my recollection. [Laughter.] In 1904 the civil-service plank of the Democratic platform read:

The Democratic Party stands committed to the principles of civil-service reform, and we demand their honest, just, and impartial enforcement.

In 1908 we find a plank in the national platform of the party at that time to read:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than services rendered to a political party.

In 1912 this plank is found:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed for all officers and employees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as a Democrat I yield not one jot or tittle to my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] as to my Democracy or to his claim in that direction. I have helped fight the battle of Democracy in the great State of Pennsylvania at times when to be a Democrat was to be ostracized politically, and I doubt very much if he can show any better record.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment offered here to-day as well as to the Senate amendment, and I trust they will be voted down in the interest of good, honest government. The civil-service law has been a great boon to all parties.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a question at this time?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULDEN. If my time has not expired, certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SHARP. Does the gentleman, as a northern Democrat, believe that one-half of his associates to-day from the Northern States would be in their seats now had they announced in their public speeches in last fall's campaign that they were in favor of this amendment?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly not. Many of them would not have been here, occupying seats of honor, faithfully serving their constituents, as they are to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] has expired. If no gentleman wants to speak, the Chair will put the question. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, while our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle are almost having hysterics because they say we are going to take from under the civil service the deputy collectors and deputy marshals, I would like to ask them how many Democrats they have recommended for appointment in their districts since they have been in Congress? Gentlemen, be honest about it. To each individual Member on the other side I propound this question. You are now holding up the civil service as the form of civic virtue and claiming to us that we are striking a blow at this Republic by attempting to remove deputy collectors and deputy marshals from this service. How many Democrats, I repeat, have you recommended in your respective districts? Not one, I will venture to say. If there has been a Democrat appointed in any one of your districts, it has been by accident, and not by your consent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I favor this amendment for two reasons—first, from a business point of view; and second, from a standpoint of fair play among the people. The duties of the deputy collectors and deputy marshals are unlike the duties imposed upon the clerks in the executive departments. These deputies are not continuously under the supervision of their superior. The deputy marshal must go out into the field and on his own initiative and by his own business ability and skill handle the business of his department or the business of his superior. Now, who is the most competent to pass upon the ability of a man to perform that particular function—the officer who is responsible to the Government for the faithful performance of that duty or some examiner whose business it is to propound to the applicant some questions contained in some textbook, the subject of which has no part in the performance of that duty? The same may be said of the deputy collectors.

I look at the matter from the business point of view. What business firm, what successful business man, would not reserve to himself the right to select his own employees? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes that I have I shall not discuss the general proposition. But a number of gentlemen here to-night, with not much experience in connection with the Civil Service Commission, at various times have taken the opportunity on the floor to reflect upon the action of the Civil Service Commission heretofore, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] a moment ago referred to the appointments under the commission as fraudulent.

During my service in this House Mr. Proctor, of Kentucky—I think his initials were J. R.—was chairman of the Civil Service Commission, a gentleman of high character, and a Kentucky Democrat; and when he passed away a distinguished citizen of my State, whom I am sorry to say my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] reflected on to-day by his criticism of the Civil Service Commission, a distinguished Democrat who held office under Democratic administration; a distinguished gallant soldier, who has the respect of Democrats and Republicans alike in the State of Illinois, Gen. John C. Black [applause], for years was the chairman of the Civil Service Commission. These two distinguished Democrats, chairmen of the Civil Service Commission under Republican administration since March 4, 1897, are a guaranty that the Republicans did not conduct that commission fraudulently, and the high character of the two chairmen is a guaranty that they did not conduct the office fraudulently.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say to my distinguished colleague from Illinois that I did not reflect upon the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman reflected upon the commission and said these appointments had been made fraudulently and contrary to law, and they could not have been made so without the connivance of Gen. John C. Black, who stands higher than my colleague or myself combined will ever reach.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to Senate amendment No. 8, not because I think it is going to revolutionize the civil service, but because I think the civil service is too great an institution to be revolutionized by one sporadic effort of any party. I think it has come to be a settled institution in this country.

I am in sympathy with the man who is hungry for a job, but not in accord with any system that would substitute political pull for honest merit.

I sympathize with the Congressmen and the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol who will have to dispense the lean patronage to the applicants. But by not agreeing to this amendment we save ourselves from a mountain of trouble and we certify to the Nation that we believe in our declarations set forth in our platform. [Applause.]

As I said, the civil service has come to be a settled institution. It is recognized as such, and that merit and character should be the sole passports to certify a man for a position, and not his cringing at the feet of a political boss, even if such be a Congressman or a Senator. [Applause.]

I believe it was Garfield who said that this Republic should spell opportunity, and no better way can be found to carry his prophecy into execution than to throw open all of the positions to every applicant who has the ability to pass a prescribed examination. Then we shall make in this Republic an opportunity for every citizen in the land.

I believe that I can say with a great deal of confidence that I am a believer in the civil service. I am one of the products of the civil service. I took the civil-service examination years ago in the city of New York and became an employee in the New York post office, and without anybody's influence, without anybody to speak for me or say a word in my behalf, I was appointed. There was not a question of politics in it, as I knew it. I was advanced by merit, as many other men were. It was under a Democratic administration. [Applause.] Henry G. Pearson was postmaster, and perhaps, for all I know, the biggest part of the force was Republican. There was no question as to a man's politics.

Now, I presume abuses have crept into the civil service in 16 years under a Republican administration. It is natural that defects should attach to human institutions under any party. Are we going, on the threshold of the great administration of Woodrow Wilson, to turn our backs upon the platform of the Democratic Party? Are we going to say to the citizens of this country that we have no faith in our own party, in our own administrative officers? Are we going to say that the Civil Service Commissioners who have been appointed by a Democratic administration are not going to give the administration a faithful and honest service? Must we anticipate in this legislative rider which attacks the civil-service law their proposed honest endeavors to satisfy all the people by an impartial service?

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Have our Democratic administrative officers any power to-day under the present system?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I presume they will under appointments that are being daily confirmed by the United States Senate.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. I think it is a long chance.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. There is no question in the world but that the man who has merit, honesty, and ability under our civil-service examination can get upon the list. If through some influence some man may be picked from that list, then I am against that system, because I believe that to the man who is highest in the qualifications the position should be given; but we are going to make a sorry spectacle of ourselves by turning our backs, right at the threshold of this administration on the Baltimore platform, and saying to the country that we have forgotten our promises, and that our pledges are to be set at naught. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, if some humble statistician had been interested in the matter and had, during the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses, tabulated the exact amount of time which has been taken up in this House in discussing this question of patronage, he would have supplied one of the best possible arguments in favor of civil-service reform. I think very probably that, reduced to terms of money, this House has expended some hundreds of thousands of dollars in talking about patronage instead of leaving the detestable subject alone, as it ought to be left alone in this House.

Gentlemen upon this side of the House have said that our Republican friends have debauched the civil service; and, therefore, what are we asked to do? Debauch it more? The answer would seem to be as though a county prosecuting officer, being inducted into office, had found that the antigambling laws had been violated, that his predecessor in office had not punished those guilty of gambling, and he therefore would recommend that the laws against gambling should be repealed instead of prosecuting the gamblers.

I have been very much interested in one aspect of the civil service, not covered by any statute, but in effect civil service. It was that great Secretary of State, Richard Olney, who wrote the first Executive order, which President Cleveland signed, in effect putting our Consular Service under civil service; and it seems to me that no Democrat should for a moment, by any vote or otherwise, do anything to stop the progress of that great reform, which had its first great incentive under Grover Cleveland.

The Senate amendment which we are now considering provides that certain appropriations involved can be used only on condition that much of the Civil Service Commission's work is to be broken down. In the latter part of this amendment, to which I am opposed, we find this language:

The officer requiring said bond shall have power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and appoint his successor at his discretion, without regard to the act, amendments, rules, or regulations aforesaid.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] who preceded me asserted, the provision I have quoted would permit internal-revenue collectors and United States marshals to remove, without regard to the civil-service acts, not only the subordinates who are required to give bonds, but "any subordinate officer or employee."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not criticize—indeed, I sympathize with—my colleagues upon the floor here from the South who favor this Senate amendment. We know that in some portions of the South the operation of the civil-service laws has brought about conditions in the service which I certainly regret and which I believe to be almost intolerable to a great majority of the estimable people of the South. But I am here representing, in part, the State of New Jersey, wherein the civil service has been greatly improved because of the operation of the civil-service laws. The spirit of reform which brought those laws into operation has been actively at work in New Jersey for many years. My people believe in reforms; in sensible, workable reform in governmental affairs—municipal, State, and national—and I am reflecting their views, as I consider it my duty to do, when I resist the passage of an amendment calculated in any degree to weaken the reforms already established in our civil service. The remedy for the condition which exists in the South must be sought, and I hope will be found, elsewhere than in the adoption of such an amendment as this.

As a matter of fact, so far as my own district is concerned, I know of no department of the Government service in which my people would be more interested in having competent and efficient subordinates than in the ranks of the collectors of the income tax. There will be few, if any, congressional districts in the United States where a greater number of citizens will be called upon to pay income taxes than in my district. In my home town this proportion is especially great, because my home town of Montclair is ranked in the statistics concerning such matters as the third richest town in the United States.

It would surely be an intolerable thing for the inquisitorial powers to be exercised by the collectors of the income tax to be employed by a personnel made up wholly of political appointments. We want these men selected after competitive examinations; we want them to be well equipped intellectually, morally, personally, if you please, to perform their duties, and we do not want them selected only because the collector of internal revenue is told to appoint them to help some aspiring politician to strengthen his political fences.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak upon this question at this time, and would not do it if it had not been for the unwarranted assault made upon me by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. This is the second unwarranted assault which he has made upon me upon the floor of this House. I denounce his statements now as being false, and I charge him with a deliberate intention of misrepresenting facts on the floor of this House as a Member of Congress. The charge that he makes that I said there were appointments made in the civil service by the Civil Service Commission that were fraudulent and contrary to law is wholly untrue, and without a scintilla of truth in it, and he knows it. The Civil Service Commission has no power to make civil-service appointments. Its powers are confined to the examination of applicants and certifying to the appointing power an eligible list from which the appointment is made. The only thing I did do was to promulgate a series of figures which have been compiled on the appointment to civil-service positions under the administrations in the past, and I said not a word about the Civil Service Commission at all, and I challenge the Record, which will be published to-morrow, to show one word that I said about the Civil Service Commission. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can not, by paying tribute to the character of the men who have served on the Civil Service Commission, defend the action of the Republican Party in making a farce of the civil-service law. Here in Washington the people understand the procedure by which the Republicans have succeeded in filling every department of the service with those who swear allegiance to their party. Whenever a Representative with influence, such as the gentleman from Illinois, has desired to secure employment for one of the "faithful" whose name was on the classified list, he has simply requested the appointment clerk or the chief clerk of the department to look after the interest of the person indorsed, and whenever that name has been certified to the department with two others, in accordance with the law, he has landed the job, regardless of whether he was first or third on the list. If his rating was such that his name was not certified by the commission, the appointment clerk would simply call for an additional certification, and continue to do so until the name of the favorite was certified to the department. Not being able to secure by this procedure as many positions as was desired, you have secured Executive orders covering into the civil service hundreds who could not have stood the test prescribed by the Civil Service Commission.

In the Southern States this kind service has been rendered to the Republican job hunters by Republican referees. In some cases it has been done upon the recommendation of negro politicians, and whether or not they received any contribution for their services can be best determined by those of you who have had experiences with them at your national conventions. All we know is that the manner in which the law has been enforced has been so partisan and the merit system so disregarded that to-day our people have no regard for the civil-service law.

Notwithstanding the superior intellect and the superior educational advantages of the white men, by some strange operation it has been almost impossible for a Democrat to secure a position in the Railway Mail Service. In my own district more than 80 per cent of the railway mail clerks are negroes, and a similar condition exists wherever Republicans have resorted to the civil service to secure positions.

By Mr. Taft's order covering fourth-class postmasters into the classified service negro postmasters have been appointed solely for political reasons at the request of negro politicians and have been clothed with the protection of the civil-service law. Many of them can barely read and write and under no circumstances could they stand the test prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. In view of these facts, the country will most likely regard the attack upon this amendment by the Republicans of the House as nothing more than hypocrisy.

The passage of this amendment can not be construed as an attack upon the civil-service system. Like many others, these officers were covered into the civil service by the Executive order of President Roosevelt. It was done simply to perpetuate Republicans in office and not because it was deemed wise or proper that applicants for these offices should be caused to stand a civil-service examination. As a matter of fact, in the interest of the service they should not be forced to stand such examination.

The fitness of a man to discharge the duties of a deputy marshal can be better determined by the United States marshal, who can give to the applicant due credit for his courage and character and his experience in like work. If forced to stand an examination and required to demonstrate his knowledge of arithmetic, geography, and history the courageous and experienced officer would have no chance in competition with the inexperienced but studious schoolboy. The Democratic Party can not be charged with violating its platform pledge or attacking the civil-service system because it fails to place in the classified service every employee of the Government. With greater force could it be contended that every employee of the Senate and of the House, and especially the Capitol police, should be placed in the classified service; and yet the Republicans, who now are so enthusiastic in their support of the civil-service system, have never seen fit to place these employees in the classified service.

Having been in power for years, you have manned every post with Republicans and you are now doing your best to enable these Republican officeholders to continue their relationship with the salary roll. For this you can not be blamed, but if the Democratic Party shall fail to divorce from this enjoyable relation to the salary roll every Republican who has been covered into the service by Executive order or appointed in any way other than as a result of an examination prescribed by the Civil Service Commission it will justly be blamed by the rank and file of the Democratic Party.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BROCKSON].

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the pending Senate amendment with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. I shall vote for that amendment, and in doing so I believe I am complying with the Democratic platform rather than antagonizing it. We declared in the Democratic platform in favor of the civil service wherein merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment. We also declared for reform of the civil service, and I contend that this is a proper reform of the civil service. [Laughter on the Republican side.] My Republican friends, your argument about our wanting offices does not conclude this argument. It is simply begging the question. A deputy is a person appointed to act for another. The question is: Are these deputies such persons as should be appointed by their superiors so that they will be responsible to their superiors and will act in accord with them? I contend, Mr. Speaker, that these deputies should be appointed by their superiors—the marshals or collectors—and everyone under them should be in accord with the head officer of that office. The Democrats are in power and are responsible for a proper execution of the laws. The people at the last election voted for a change. How can we give them the change of government demanded by them if we keep in office Republicans who prefer to carry out Republican policies rather than put in force Democratic policies?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask how much time remains?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes. The gentleman from New York has three.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What was the time remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has 10 minutes and the gentleman from New York 3.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. COOPER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BUTLER. To get some information from the Speaker which will be reliable. I would like to ask under what arrangement debate is going on?

The SPEAKER. Under the arrangement that the gentleman from New York had an hour and gave the gentleman from Georgia 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts had an hour and gave the gentleman from Georgia 30 minutes, so the gentleman from Georgia got an hour.

Mr. COOPER. Debate has now been going on about two-and a half hours.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the gentleman counts in the debate on the conference report. Two or three others have done the same thing.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield all the time remaining to me to my colleague [Mr. HARDWICK], except two minutes, and those two minutes I yield to my colleague upon the committee [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that the House, and possibly the country as well, is attaching undue importance to this particular matter. It does not seem to me that the pending proposition is any assault on the principles of the merit system nor that any action we may take to-night one way or the other will be any violation of any platform pledge that the Democratic Party has ever made, or of any position it has ever taken. I wish to address myself briefly to those questions. In the first place, I want to say to my Democratic colleagues that we understand full well the position and attitude that our Republican friends are occupying on this question. It is a position that reeks with cant; it is a position that is full of hypocrisy.

For 16 years they have prostituted the civil service. For 16 years they have manipulated the civil service so that no man but a Republican had much of a chance to get in, and few but Republicans did get in, and now after having had 16 fat years, with their people in power all the time, with Democrats given but little opportunity for public service, they now profess a sudden virtue and an unexampled and unequalled devotion to the principles of civil service and of the merit system. If they want to be fair about this matter, if they want to be honest about this thing, what would they do? They would say: We will wipe out the slate and start over. We will not contend that these men, whom we have covered into all the branches of the service by the thousands by Executive order and not by competitive examination, ought to keep their offices, but that there ought to be a real merit examination and the men who stand highest—absolutely in order, right down the list, whether they are Democrats or Republicans—ought to be given the places.

That is the real civil service that obtains to-day in Great Britain. That is the real civil service that we have promised the people of the United States. But that is not the civil service that has existed in this country, and the prostitution of which has been and is a public scandal, notorious and malodorous.

In the next place, let me tell you, my colleagues, that not one of these places to which this amendment applies was ever put under the civil service by law at all. Therefore we violate no provision of the Democratic platform, because that platform refers solely to the civil-service law, and not to Executive orders that were issued by Republican Presidents. They say that Mr. Cleveland covered Democrats in, and my colleague from Ohio

[Mr. GORDON] very pertinently called attention to the fact that no sooner had the Republicans carried the next election than Mr. McKinley revoked Mr. Cleveland's order and covered the Democrats out.

Gentlemen, that is exactly what we have objected to in this existing sham called "civil service." We have objected to making the civil-service cause the football of either Republican or Democratic politicians. We have objected to this covering in and covering out. We say that that sort of civil service is a fraud, a sham, a delusion, and a snare, and a stench in the nostrils of all honest and self-respecting men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It seems to me if our Republican brethren wanted to be fair they would be perfectly content to wipe out the slate and start over and have a real merit system, and I believe the Democratic Party, pledged as it is to this great cause, is bound during this administration to establish a real civil service instead of the sham that now exists, and to give the people a real civil-service shrine at which they can worship, instead of a whitened sepulcher. That is what we want to do.

Now, let me tell you another thing about these particular offices. In the first place, we violate no Democratic platform if we adopt this amendment; we violate no pledge we have ever made to the people if we simply change an Executive order and not a law.

* In the next place, there are reasons—and good reasons, too—why these particular offices ought not to be under the civil service at all, and I want to state them to you. In the first place, the United States marshal is responsible for every act of his deputies. The marshal himself can be sued on his own bond for every act of his deputy that is unlawful. The United States collector of internal revenue is responsible for every act of his deputy, and he can be sued on his own bond for every act of that deputy. Now, I want to ask you who would undertake to appoint a cashier to run a bank under a civil-service examination? Nobody on this earth, as some one suggests. I want to tell you another thing. They have school examinations for those places, or are undertaking to have them. They asked in one examination that was held in a southern city a question somewhat like this: "Give the population of five Ohio towns (of about 7,000 or 8,000 population) and tell what their principal industries are."

None of our people could stand that sort of an examination, and I doubt if any Ohio man could have stood it if you had asked him any questions about Georgia towns of that size and character. They asked, also, all sorts of questions about higher mathematics, and the result was, in one case that I heard of, that a gentleman who had had long practical experience as sheriff, the executive officer of a great county in Georgia, could not stand the examination, it was so inapt and inappropriate for the duties of the required service, and at the same time his son, a schoolboy, stood the examination with flying colors. That is the sort of examinations we have had, and I say that it is all a sham, a delusion, and a snare. In these examinations for deputy collector or deputy marshal, experience ought to be rated at fully 75 per cent of the total mark. You take a man who has been the sheriff of a great county in Georgia, Ohio, or Illinois, and who has shown he has practical knowledge of men and affairs, a practical ability to execute process and enforce orders, and he will make a forty-times better collector or marshal than some boy out of school, who will beat him to death on a book examination. For that reason I say there ought to be no examination for these places. We who are charged with the responsibility for administering these offices ought to see that men of practical ability and practical common sense, whether they know about the Bering Straits or something like that in geography, or whether they can analyze a compound sentence or not, or whether they can answer all the questions that might be propounded in grammar or history or geography or not, ought to have these places; and nine times out of ten such men will make more efficient officers, and efficiency and honesty of service will be promoted by it. All of this cant and hypocrisy about examinations for these places does not appeal to me. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] constrains me to say something I had not intended to inject into this debate. The gentleman referred contemptuously to the fact that Tammany Hall was defending the civil service. I am not a member of Tammany Hall and I am not eligible for membership in Tammany Hall. It is popularly the designation that is given to the Democratic organization of the county of New York, in the State of New York. I do not live in that county, but in Kings County. If I did live in New York County, I would be affiliated with Tammany Hall. It is vilified by the opponents of the Democratic Party, not only in New York City, but throughout the country, and Democrats should not be parties to these vilifications.

I sympathize with my colleagues from the South and West in their desire to have these offices filled by Democrats. But think of the situation now existing in the city of New York! A campaign of momentous importance to the Democratic Party is being waged. All the enemies of Democracy in the city and in the country are aligned in an effort to overthrow the organized Democracy in their attempt to place Democratic officials in power. The candidate of these enemies of the Democratic Party is a Democratic official, appointed by a Democratic President, and confirmed by a Democratic Senate. Every other Federal office in the city of New York is filled with bitter partisan Republicans, and they are all actively engaged in an effort to elect this candidate at the expense of the Democratic Party.

What will happen one year from this fall if this attempt by the combined enemies of Democracy in a great city to defeat the Democratic Party is successful and Democratic candidates for Congress appeal for the suffrages of the people?

This Democratic official, who is the candidate of the Republican Party, nominated in a Republican primary, issued a statement to the effect that under no circumstances would he accept a nomination from or would he consent to be the candidate of the Democratic Party organized under the primary law and holding a primary conducted by officials appointed under that law, but that he would consent to be the candidate of all the opponents of the Democratic Party, which he desired to drive out of power. He charges that they desire to have a government of corruption "by contract," as he says, and at unjustifiable expense to the people of the city.

Here is my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN], serving honorably his fifth term in this House [applause], a candidate on the regular Democratic ticket in the city of New York for the office of president of the board of aldermen. Here is my colleague from Brooklyn [Mr. METZ], serving his first term in this House, who served the city of New York as a Democratic comptroller for four years [applause], and after the most minute and thorough investigation by all the opponents of the Democracy not a single charge could be made against the efficiency or honesty of his administration [applause], again a candidate of the regular Democracy for the office of comptroller; and these two men are charged by this Democratic official, the only important Federal officer appointed by this administration in the city of New York, with being candidates of the men who are opposed to decency and respectability in government in the city of New York. They spent this long session of Congress here, Mr. Speaker, carrying out the pledges of the Democratic Party to put on the statute books the Democratic tariff bill; and at a time when it is more important that collectors of the port, particularly the collector at the port of New York, where 67 per cent of the revenues under the customs law is collected, should be devoting all of their regular working hours and most of their overtime to an attempt to see that this law is administered in such a way that there can be no criticism, that there can be no faultfinding by our opponents—the man selected by this Democratic administration for this important duty is spending his days and his nights vilifying the Democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have served in this House as a representative of the New York Democracy for nearly 15 years. I apologize to no man for my record here, and I assert that I and those associated with me in the Democratic Party in the city of New York are just as patriotic and just as honest and just as sincere in our desire for decent, honest, efficient government as any man in the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, we do not deserve the criticism nor condemnation of our Democratic colleagues; rather we should have their sympathy. [Applause.] I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, before that question is put I want to ask unanimous consent that the gentlemen who have spoken on this amendment shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that the Members who have spoken on this amendment shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to recede from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment No. 8 and concur in the same with an amendment.

Mr. MANN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 106, answered "present" 4, not voting 207, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. BARTLETT was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the vote be recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. We can not tell whether a recapitulation ought to be granted until we know how the vote is.

Mr. MANN. Of course after the result is announced it is too late to recapitulate it, and the vote, as I understand it, is only three or four apart. The ayes have it, according to the count, by only three or four on the roll call as it stands, and that is very close.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the roll call ought to be concluded. There are certain gentlemen present before the desk who desire to ascertain how they voted.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS, is recorded as having voted?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Minnesota. I voted "nay." I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. McCoy was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I answered "present" under the apprehension that I was paired. I am not paired and I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. ADAMSON was called, and he answered "Yea."

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman have a pair with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have had on several occasions, but when he and this gentleman went to Europe, I agreed that they should stand paired until he returned. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has not returned, and, in fairness, I am holding him to his pair.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. FORDNEY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, having a general pair with the gentleman, I feel constrained to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. HARDWICK was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POU. How are we going to know whether a recapitulation of the vote is necessary until the vote is announced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows what the result is. The Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

The Clerk recapitulated the vote.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Commencing October 1 for remainder of the session:

Mr. REED with Mr. WINSLOW.

Until further notice:

 Mr. MORRISON with Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington.
 Mr. SUMNERS with Mr. ESCH.
 Mr. HARRISON (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania (in favor of civil service).
 Mr. DICKINSON with Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska (after vote on tariff conference report, currency excepted at option of either).
 Mr. STEPHENS of California with Mr. WITHERSPOON (commencing Oct. 3, 1913, except on cotton-future amendment).
 Mr. ALLEN with Mr. J. M. C. SMITH (commencing Oct. 1, except on currency and tariff).
 Mr. HENSLEY with Mr. DYER (commencing Oct. 1).
 Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. GOOD (commencing Oct. 1).
 Mr. CLINE with Mr. NORTON (commencing Oct. 1).
 Mr. ASWELL with Mr. McLAUGHLIN (commencing Sept. 3).
 Mr. HARDWICK with Mr. FORDNEY (commencing Oct. 1).
 On this vote:
 Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas with Mr. LANGLEY.
 Mr. WINGO with Mr. VOLSTEAD.
 Mr. MCCOY with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.
 Mr. QUIN (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. GARDNER (against).
 Mr. STANLEY (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. FARR (against).
 Mr. THOMAS (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. EDMONDS (against).
 Mr. HOWARD (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. GRIEST (against).
 Mr. CARAWAY (for Bartlett amendment) with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island (against).
 The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
 On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the vote just had was laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that there were several days here when I wanted to have debate. The Democrats would not permit, and I do not propose that they shall now put remarks in the RECORD which were not made upon the floor. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask whether, if the consent is granted, it is the intention of the gentleman to soon move to adjourn?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the next few amendments can be disposed of without any difficulty.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. MCCOY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the gentleman from New Jersey extending his remarks in the RECORD, because of the peculiar situation in which he finds himself, having a pair, and being compelled to withdraw his vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and permission is granted.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. BATHRICK. To do what?

The SPEAKER. To object to the gentleman from New Jersey extending his remarks. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m.?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not make that 10 o'clock. I think we can meet at 10 o'clock and get through so as to go home to-morrow night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in order to ascertain what Members desire, I ask the Speaker to submit the request first for 10 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I shall object.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the objection to going on to-night?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. Sisson. I reserved the right to object. I want to ask the gentleman from New York what is the objection to going on to-night.

Mr. MANN. There is no quorum here now.

Mr. Sisson. We have got a quorum here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not finish to-night.

Mr. MANN. There is no quorum here now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. I told the gentleman I would object to that. It is entirely too early.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I could not get time from either side to speak for half a minute on the civil-service question, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will there be objection to my extending my remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would just like to know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can hitch his request on to that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would like to have my request extended in connection with that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. KINKADE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am in the same predicament of my good friend from Pennsylvania. I was unable to get time from either side, and I ask that my request be hitched on to his.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKADE] makes the same request.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I tried to obtain five minutes time in regard to this amendment, being opposed to this amendment, and therefore make the same request as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California couples with the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania a request to extend his remarks. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKADE], the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] all ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. And also the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. And I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KIRKPATRICK] also asks unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. As gentlemen refused the opportunity and objected to debate here for two or three days, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the tenth amendment.

Page 4 of the printed bill, after line 2, insert the following:

"(10) To the heirs of Angelo Albano, $6,000, in accordance with the recommendations of the President contained in his message dated June 26, 1913 (H. Doc. No. 105, 63d Cong., 1st sess.)."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 10.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 10.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the next amendment is No. 11.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 11.

Amendment No. 11, page 4, line 8. Insert the following:

"That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $72,000, to be paid to the following-named persons in the amount specified to each, for injuries sustained by shots fired across the American boundary line by soldiers and revolutionists on the Mexican side of the line in the year 1911, to wit: Adolfo Varela, of El Paso, Tex., $3,000; Virginia Moorhead, of El Paso, Tex., $3,000; Abundio Soto, of El Paso, Tex., $4,000; Edwin G. Heaton, of El Paso, Tex., $2,000; Celia Griffiths, of El Paso, Tex., $15,000; A. R. Chandler, of El Paso, Tex., $12,000; Emma Larson, of Douglas, Ariz., $1,000; Elmer E. Crowe, of Douglas, Ariz., $5,000; Francis F. Williams, of Douglas, Ariz., $5,000; John W. Keate, of Douglas, Ariz., $5,000; Joseph W. Harrington, of Douglas, Ariz., $15,000; William R. White, of Douglas, Ariz., $2,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move as a substitute that the House recede and concur in this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] makes the preferential motion that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment No. 11.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will just state briefly what the situation is. Down on the border between Mexico and the United States during two engagements between the Federal and insurgent forces in Mexico a number of persons were killed and injured on the American side. The Mexican Government offered to settle some of these claims, but everybody to whom it made the offer rejected the offer as too small. A board of Army officers was appointed, made an investigation, and reported in favor of payment of certain sums. I have examined the record, and in some instances, Mr. Speaker, it appears that part of these claimants went to exposed positions to witness the battles. They were driven away and later returned, when the opportunity came, and were injured. The parents of a man who earned about $50 a month, and which man, it is asserted, contributed something to the support of his parents, were awarded, because of his death, $15,000. That illustrates the character of the awards that have been made.

There is no claim against the United States, but the contention is that the United States should pay these claims and then present them to the Government of Mexico as a national claim. In my opinion, the United States is not responsible for these claims; and if these persons have any claims at all they are against the Government of Mexico and should be presented by the United States to the Government of Mexico and adjusted there. In my opinion, if the United States pays this $72,000, Mexico will never reimburse us, and, in my opinion, it should not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. If the Government of the United States pays these claims, is there any escape, as a matter of precedent, hereafter for the United States from paying the claims of all American citizens in Mexico who allege they have been injured in the insurrection down there, and then depending upon us afterwards to collect them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That states the facts, I think, fairly. There is another reason why I hope the House will insist on its disagreement to this amendment. It is our desire—and we endeavor as far as possible to do it—to keep from these appropriation bills items for the payment of claims that have no business upon them. Members in charge of these bills should not be burdened with the necessity of wading through reports aggregating 500 and 600 pages in an attempt to determine whether the claims are proper and just. These bills should carry the money necessary to defray the legitimate and authorized expenses of the Government.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment I will.

These claims should be carried in a separate bill and investigated by the committees having jurisdiction of them, and the House should be given an opportunity to consider them at length. I understand there is a bill pending for these matters now before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House. The House managers refused to agree to Senate amendment No. 10, although the House had passed a bill to do that very thing, and we took the position that if the Senate wishes to pass that bill it now has the opportunity. I hope the House will not encourage the passage of these matters on these bills.

Mr. TEMPLE. Can the gentleman say whether all these persons are American citizens or whether some of them are citizens of Mexico? The reason I ask that question is because there are two bills now in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, one of them covering American citizens and the other covering citizens of the Republic of Mexico domiciled in Texas, and the question is where the appropriation should be made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am informed that these claims are claims of American citizens, and those who were not American citizens were eliminated.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a little time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have stated the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would like a little time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a little time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the payment of these claims will not set a precedent for the payment of claims of American citizens accruing in Mexico. These are claims for damages to American citizens who were injured on this side of the line, in our own country, and under our own protection. When American citizens go to Mexico they take their chances on Mexican jurisdiction and Mexican protection, and the settlement of these claims would not be a precedent for the settlement of those.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these claims, I believe, ought to be paid, and they ought to be paid now. They have already been adjudicated. On August 9, 1912, Congress passed a joint resolution providing for a commission to investigate and pass upon these claims, fixing the amount of damages due. There was a commission appointed and an investigation was made, and any man who will read this report will see that the gentlemen who made the investigation and made the report were well versed in international law and had large experience and knowledge of claims of this sort, and every claim that is in this bill that is presented here is absolutely in accordance with the judgment of that commission, and the purpose for which the commission was appointed was that these claims should be adjudicated, so that Congress could pay them.

Now, I want to say to gentlemen of the House that these injuries occurred—

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. In just a minute. These injuries occurred when these people were at home, nearly all of them about their business; some of them in their own homes, one of them in her own home in bed; and the only two that there is any question raised about were the two that were referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who were said to be standing several hundred yards up in the center of the city of El Paso, across the river from where the fighting took place, looking over in that direction.

Now, the theory of these claims is this: When the Mexican troops fired across the border and wounded our own people they violated the sovereignty of this Nation, and it is the opinion of all the international lawyers and authorities that I have consulted that it is the duty of this Government to pay these claims and present them for payment as a whole to the Mexican Government.

Now I want to call attention for a moment to the history of the proceedings with reference to these claims. These damages occurred more than two years ago. The claimants presented these claims to our State Department. Nothing was done with them except to transmit them to the City of Mexico. These claimants were required to present their claims to a Mexican tribunal in the City of Mexico, which disregarded them. Subsequently the Mexican Government authorized Mexican consuls on the border to investigate and report them. These claimants went before those consuls and presented their claims, but nothing ever came of them except the offer of $500 to men who were injured and not killed and a thousand dollars apiece for those who were killed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says that a settlement has been offered by Mexico. That was the so-called settlement that was offered—compensation that was absolutely inadequate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Then these claimants came to Congress. They were presented to the Committees on Foreign Affairs of the House and Senate. The result was this joint resolution and this commission. Then they went before this commission and presented their cases and their evidence, and this commission made its report.

Now, then, bills have been presented to both Committees on Foreign Affairs of the House and the Senate for the payment of these claims in accordance with said report. The House committee has considered these claims and made a unanimous report in favor of them, and this is the third time that the Senate has passed these claims and sent them to this House.

Now, after all of these efforts made by these claimants to have these damages settled, I do not see why they should go out on a technicality here. Why not pay them? Why say that we must go to the Committee on Claims when we have been to the proper committees of this House?

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman why he did not have the Democratic caucus release these claims, so that they might come before the House in regular order?

Mr. BARTLETT. Because they were not emergency claims.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I did not submit them to the Democratic caucus for that reason—that the caucus was desirous of limiting legislation at this extra session. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House was free to report this bill at this session, it would have been reported. It unanimously reported them at one time. There is not a claim in this whole bunch that there is any question about or in regard to which any question was ever raised by the Senate or the House committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think that the amount of $12,000 or $15,000 for these claims is exorbitant?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not. In the Griffith claim, which was awarded to the amount of $15,000, Col. Kernan, chairman of that commission, wanted to allow $32,000. He is a man who is an expert in the business, because he spent years in Cuba examining Spanish-American claims after the war and reported upon war claims.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think that we ought to make the Government pay more than a jury would award in a railroad case?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. A jury in El Paso would allow $15,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. If they had, a judge would have set it aside.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No judge would have been justified in doing so. In the case of Chandler, in which $12,000 was awarded, Col. Kernan wanted to allow $22,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Who appointed this commission?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The Secretary of War.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps the gentleman may know that I am a new Member and I am asking for information. The title of this bill is to supply urgent deficiencies and appropriations, and glancing through the bill the item that the gentleman speaks of is a prominent one. I would like to ask in what way is this an urgent deficiency when it is a claim against the Government of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. What does the gentleman mean by "deficiency"? If the gentleman understands the meaning of the word "deficiency" as I do, I want to say to him that there are a number of items in this bill that are not strictly deficiencies. There always has been and always will be.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Appropriations are made to carry on the Government, and if a given appropriation becomes inadequate a further appropriation to cover this deficiency I would, generally speaking, denominate an urgent deficiency appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, again I want to urge the adoption of my substitute. These claims ought to have been paid long ago. These people were injured by foreign guns, and in the presence of a sufficient force of American troops to have afforded protection. Having failed to afford protection, the Government ought to make compensation, especially as these claimants have no private means of redress.

As to Mexico, the claims are national. Her offense was against the Nation and she should be held responsible to the Nation. But what we are here now asking is that our Nation shall deal justly with our own people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield me five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor of having one son, who, on account of his health, spends his time in the southwest, and on the occasion which is referred to by this amendment, being like his father, not very much afraid of things, he was at El Paso watching the battle. He was on the Santa Fe Railroad bridge, knowing perfectly well that he was taking his chances, and knowing perfectly well that if anything happened to him his father would not be asking the Government of the United States to pay the damages. [Applause.]

What is the character of these claims? I will cite you one. A man by the name of Griffith was killed at a point west of the Santa Fe bridge by a bullet fired from the direction of Juarez, Mexico. A short time previous to his death the deceased had been warned to keep out of danger and had been driven off the railroad embankment where he was watching the battle at Juarez, Mexico, and he returned to the embankment in violation of the orders.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not at present. That is the report of the commission, and the commission awarded him $15,000 for marching in front of a bullet which he knew was dangerous. Having violated the orders he walked into the battle where he knew he would be in danger, and the gentleman from Texas has the gall to come here and ask the Government of the United States to pay him $15,000 after the Government of Mexico had offered to pay $2,000, and that was a swindle against the Government of Mexico to make the demand.

This man deliberately walked into danger. The Government of the United States is not responsible for men who are killed through battles that occur in Mexico by bullets which cross the line. This man took his chances like my boy did, and we ought to stand fair to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Has the gentleman read the testimony in that case?

Mr. MANN. I have read the complete volume of testimony that thick [indicating]. Has the gentleman from Texas read it?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will say that I have read the testimony in that case, and I do not find any testimony of any witness that supports that summary.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman comes here and asks us to pay, and bases that on the report of a commission—and I have read the complete report of the commission on the proposition—and then the gentleman repudiates the report of the commission. I repudiate the whole thing.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I find no such evidence in that case. It is not in the book.

Mr. MANN. What is not in the book?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The testimony.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of the testimony here. I read the report of the commission, and I have also read the testimony.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman another question about the Varela case. Did the gentleman notice that that person was shot in the head while she was lying in bed in her own home? Also, about the Moorehead case? There the victim was shot in the side while in her own home, and in the case of Soto, he was shot while in his own home.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that it may be that the Government of the United States should hold the Government of Mexico responsible in some of these cases. If I had my way about it, President Wilson would hold the Government of Mexico responsible now for the damages that are being perpetrated against American citizens and American property in Mexico, but I am unwilling to fix a precedent here which, because he is afraid to do that, would make the Government of the United States pay all these claims in the end, commencing here with fraudulent claims which have no merit to begin with.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion these are just claims and ought to be paid. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has taken the only two cases among the whole list and pointed out where anyone was warned away from the international boundary line. One of the largest items in this bill is for the life of a locomotive engineer who was killed in the city of Douglas, Ariz., while sitting in the cab of his engine, more than a mile away from the Mexican border. He was struck by a bullet and instantly killed. Another man was shot three-quarters of a mile north of the line while on the way to his home. The gentleman has picked out the only two cases where the claimant was warned to keep out of danger, and wants to make us believe that all of these claims are in a similar situation. These claims have been examined by a commission appointed under authority of Congress, and they have been favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House. They have been passed by the Senate three times, and it is time that these people were paid. Two years now have gone by, and if the claimants are ever to get any benefit of this money they should get it now and not wait until eternity.

To show that none of the persons injured during the fight at Agua Prieta had any warning that they were in danger, I desire to print the findings of fact approved by the military commission respecting the injuries sustained by citizens of the United States at Douglas, Ariz., in April, 1911:

Claimant: Emma Larson.

Residence: Douglas, Ariz.

Nationality: American.

Nature of claim: Abrasions on face and neck caused by splintered glass as a result of a bullet shot.

The evidence in this case shows that the claimant was born in Christiania, Norway, in 1860; that in 1877 she married Tom Larson, a native-born citizen of the United States; that he died in 1892; that on the 17th day of April, 1911, during the Battle of Agua Prieta, while the claimant was engaged in her duties as housekeeper for Horace Rutherford, a bullet struck the window of the kitchen, causing some broken glass to strike the side of her face and neck; that as a result of said injury the claimant received some shock and pain and nervous tension, but no disability. It is further shown that the representative of the Mexican Government offered the claimant, through her attorneys at Douglas, an indemnity of $200, which was refused by claimant. Amount of damage assessed at $1,000.

Claimant: Elmer E. Crowe.

Residence: Douglas, Ariz.

Nationality: American citizen.

Nature of claim: Gunshot wound in right arm and through the body.

In this case it is conclusively proven that claimant was wounded in Douglas, Ariz., on the 13th day of April, 1911, by a bullet fired from the direction of Agua Prieta, Mexico, said bullet passing through the right arm and through the right side of claimant's body; that the claimant is a native-born citizen of the United States, born in Mercer County, Ill., on the 14th of September, 1867; is a married man, having a wife and minor child; that at the time he was wounded he was performing his regular duties in the El Paso Southwestern Railroad yards; that he has received some permanent disability as a result of said wound; and that the Mexican Government made an offer of $500 in satisfaction of this claim, which offer was refused by claimant. Amount of damage assessed at $5,000.

Claimant: Francis Forrester Williams.

Residence: Douglas, Ariz.

Nationality: American citizen.

Nature of claim: Gunshot wound through body.

In this case it is conclusively shown that the claimant was wounded in Douglas, Ariz., on the 17th day of April, 1911, by a bullet fired from the direction of Agua Prieta, Mexico, said bullet entering claimant's body near left shoulder blade and coming out near left nipple; that the claimant is a native-born citizen of the United States, born in Decatur, Ill., May 10, 1869; is a married man, having a wife and a minor child; that at the time he was wounded he was about three-quarters of a mile north of the international line on his way home; that he has received some permanent disability as a result of said wound; and that the Mexican Government made an offer of $500 in satisfaction of this claim, which offer was refused by claimant. Amount of damage assessed at $5,000.

Claimant: John W. Keate.

Residence: Hurley, N. Mex.

Nationality: American.

In this case it is proven that claimant was born in Arizona in 1882; that on the 17th day of April, 1911, he was a resident of Douglas, Ariz., and while watching a battle between the Mexican federals and insurgents from the Douglas lumberyard claimant was hit in the left foot by a bullet fired from the direction of Agua Prieta; that as a result of said wound claimant has received some permanent disability. It is further shown that a representative of the Mexican Government offered the claimant, through his attorneys at Douglas, the amount of $500 as an indemnity for said injury, which was refused by claimant. Amount of damage assessed at $5,000.

Claimant: Joseph W. Harrington, on behalf of heirs.

Residence: 114 Plum Street, Atlanta, Ga.

Nationality: American.

Nature of claim: Death of brother, Robert H. Harrington.

In this case it is conclusively proved that Robert Homer Harrington, brother of the claimant, was killed at Douglas, Ariz., on April 13, 1911, by a bullet fired from the direction of Agua Prieta; that at the time the deceased was struck by a bullet he was riding on a switch engine of the El Paso Southwestern Railroad.

It is also proved that the deceased, Robert H. Harrington, was born May 31, 1873, in Gainesville, Ga.; that he was 38 years old, a single man, and contributed to some extent toward the support of his mother. It is further shown that the Mexican Government offered the heirs of Robert H. Harrington, through their attorneys, the sum of $1,000 as an indemnity for his death; that this offer was refused; that subsequently the above offer was increased to $2,000; said offer also was declined. Amount of damages assessed at $15,000.

Claimant: William R. White.

Nationality: American.

Residence: Cananea, Mexico.

Nature of claim: Gunshot wound through left leg.

In this case the attorneys were unable to bring before the commission the claimant, William R. White, or to secure his signature to a petition addressed to the commission, but at the request of the attorneys a copy of the petition addressed to the Secretary of State was filed with this commission and made the basis of this investigation.

The evidence produced shows the claimant to be a citizen of the United States, about 21 years of age, and single; that on April 13, 1911, he received a flesh wound in the left leg below the knee while on American territory and during an engagement then in progress near Agua Prieta, Mexico, between Mexican federal troops and insurgents; that in all human probability the bullet came from the Mexican forces engaged as above; and that no permanent disability has resulted, and the commission assesses the damage at $2,000 United States currency.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] to recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11 and concur in the same.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Texas) there were—ayes 10, noes 87.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate amendments 27 to 33, inclusive, be considered together. They all affect the assay offices.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know how many more amendments the gentleman proposes to have action upon to-night?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This batch.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that amendments 27 to 33, inclusive, be considered together.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest—

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman does not indicate or seem to want to indicate—

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). There will be no controversy over these amendments.

Mr. MOORE. I understood the gentleman to say he wanted to get through with this batch.

Mr. BARTLETT. They all relate to the same subject.

Mr. MOORE. Very well; then I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to consider amendments 27 to 33, inclusive. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the Senate is willing to recede on these amendments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they insist on their amendments.

Mr. RAKER. It is getting very late to-night, and some of our people—

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is not interested in these amendments. They do not affect anything in which the gentleman is interested.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; these people deserve and are entitled—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they can be considered together; gentlemen have time to protect themselves—

Mr. RAKER. They are all practically upon the same basis, and there is no reason why they should not be considered together. Then why not get unanimous consent and take them up to-morrow?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not take two minutes. In the last sundry civil bill an agreement was reached, and now it is an attempt on the part of the Senate to go back on what they said in that agreement.

Mr. RAKER. I see.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. MANN. That is, in regard to these claims?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Arizona ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks on amendment numbered 11. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon amendment numbered 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on amendment numbered 8. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object. I could hardly hear the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about played out.

Mr. MANN. If the Speaker is about played out—

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair stated.

Mr. MANN. I said, if the Speaker is played out, I think it is time to quit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the extension of the remarks of the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are all played out, and the gentleman objects to my extending my remarks in regard to a subject that I feel interested in and upon which I tried to obtain some time but could not do so—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will get the gentleman time to-morrow to make a speech.

Mr. RAKER. No; but it is passed then, you see.

Mr. PAYNE. On the question of unanimous consent to make a speech, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendment numbered 8.

Mr. PAYNE. That is making a speech.

The SPEAKER. Well, it is and it is not. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. To extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendment No. 8.

Mr. MANN. I objected some time ago very loudly, and I gave the reason why, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] knows it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will report these amendments.

Page 13, after line 14, insert the following.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that when even as strong a man as the Speaker is tired—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us dispose of them.

Mr. MANN. If it will take only a minute to-night, it will take but half a minute to-morrow.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not take more than that to-night. I will not adjourn unless I am forced to do so.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants me to do so, I will make a point of no quorum to-night, but if I do not I will make it when we first meet to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. Saturday, October 11, 1913.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 8826) limiting the hours of labor of persons engaged in producing interstate commerce; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8827) granting old-age pensions; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATKINS: A bill (H. R. 8828) to carry into effect the provisions of the act of Congress forming the Public Health Service by providing penalties for the pollution of the navigable streams and waterways of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PALMER (by request): A bill (H. R. 8829) to make December 2 of each and every year a public holiday in the District of Columbia, to be known as Monroe Doctrine Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 8832) to reclassify the salaries of assistant postmasters and employees above the clerical grades in post offices of the first and second class; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. CHANDLER of New York: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) that it is the sense of the American Congress that the powers take steps to compel the acquiescence of Roumania in the treaty of Berlin; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KAHN: Resolution (H. Res. 279) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the House the names of all employees in the Treasury Department in the classified or unclassified service who have been reduced or advanced in rank since March 4, 1913; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 280) directing the Postmaster General to transmit to the House the names of all employees in the Post Office Department in the classified or unclassified service who have been reduced or advanced in rank since March 4, 1913; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 281) directing the Public Printer to transmit to the House the names of all employees in the Government Printing Office in the classified or unclassified service who have been reduced or advanced in rank since March 4, 1913; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. MONDELL: Resolution (H. Res. 282) calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for facts relative to the provision contained in tariff act of October 3, 1913, providing for a reduction of 5 per cent in tariff duties on all goods imported in certain vessels; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 283) calling upon the Secretary of State for facts relative to the provision contained in tariff act of October 3, 1913, providing for a discount of 5 per cent in tariff rates on goods imported in certain vessels; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 8830) for the relief of the heirs of William H. Whiteside; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PALMER: A bill (H. R. 8831) granting a pension to Mrs. William Snyder; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EAGAN: A bill (H. R. 8833) to remove the charge of desertion and grant an honorable discharge to Claus Dentzau; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GEORGE: A bill (H. R. 8834) for the relief of Leon Greenbaum; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. MAPES: Petitions of sundry citizens of the cities of Holland, Zeeland, Coopersville, and Grand Haven, Mich., favoring H. R. 5308 for the taxation of mail-order houses for the development of the communities in which they sell goods; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROUSE: Petition of citizens of the sixth district of Kentucky, favoring change in the interstate-commerce laws relative to mail-order houses paying their share of taxes, etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 11, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, God our Father, our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee for the splendid achievements of men in the material, intellectual, moral, and spiritual fields of endeavor, making the world a better place for our sojourn, and which tends to solidify the race into one family. Especially do we thank Thee for the wonderful skill and energy which have just connected the two great oceans, bringing the world of mankind closer together, lessening the danger of navigation, making it less difficult for the exchange of products between nations, bringing out the latent possibilities of brain and brawn, which promise still greater achievements. And we most fervently pray that as nation is thus brought nearer to nation, a better understanding may obtain in all the relationships of life and Thy love be reflected in every movement toward the peace and happiness of mankind. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 7898).

The SPEAKER. By order of the House last night amendments numbered 27 to 33, inclusive, were to be considered together.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. After the agreement of the House last night that amendments numbered 28 to 33, inclusive—

The SPEAKER. Numbered 27—

Mr. RAKER. Yes; numbered 27 to 33, both inclusive—that they should be considered as one amendment, the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was to insist on the disagreement to the amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not been reported yet. I have made no motion.

The SPEAKER. They have never been reported. The House adjourned just after that order was made.

Mr. RAKER. Very well. What I wanted to know was whether it is too late now to make the motion to recede and concur?

The SPEAKER. No motion has been made at all. When the House reports these amendments anybody can make any motion he pleases. The Clerk will report the amendments from 27 to 33, both inclusive.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13 of the printed bill, beginning with line 14, insert the following:

"MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

"For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, additional for the fiscal year 1914, $10,000.

"Mint at Carson City, Nev.: For incidental and contingent expenses, additional for fiscal year 1914, $1,000.

"Assay office at Boise, Idaho: For incidental and contingent expenses, additional for fiscal year 1914, $1,000.

"Assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: For incidental and contingent expenses, new machinery, etc., additional for fiscal year 1914, $500.

"Assay office at Helena, Mont.: For incidental and contingent expenses, additional for fiscal year 1914, $1,000.

"Assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah: For incidental and contingent expenses, additional for fiscal year 1914, $1,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 27 to 33, both inclusive.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] makes the preferential motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 27 to 33, both inclusive, and concur therein. Those in favor of the motion—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. There are several others from the West who would like a little time. I would like to have 10 minutes myself, and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] would like to have about 5 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes. I do not think this is a matter on which we need take very much time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] each desire to have five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will give the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] five minutes. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yields five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to this amendment, found on pages 13 and 14. The first one provides for the freight on bullion and coin by registered mail or otherwise between the mint and assay offices, additional for fiscal year 1914. Only those who have had practical knowledge and experience in the mining districts of the West can appreciate what this means. The intent of the amendment is to encourage mining and to make it as convenient as possible for those interested in the mines to have some place and some method to dispose of and handle the gold and silver and other minerals they obtain from the earth.

The question of the mint at Carson City, Nev., "For incidental and contingent expenses, additional for fiscal year 1914, $1,000," is another amendment. The mint has been there for many years. It is in a highly mineralized district, and it has done much good to this country to maintain this mint and to give the miners and those interested an opportunity to have their product disposed of and handled properly.

I am advised that if this appropriation is not made there will not be a sufficient amount of money to run the mint to its full capacity during the end of the year. Certainly this House does not want to cripple the service; it does not want to shut down the mint at Carson City.

It is the same way at Boise, Idaho, and at Deadwood, at Helena, and at Salt Lake. The committee passed upon this matter two years ago by a very strong vote. It reported the abolition of these various mints and assay offices. It went to the House and they were retained and put back, and by a direct vote squarely upon these matters the House retained them in the bill, and they have been in use and operation ever since. But they did not give a sufficient amount of money to run them during the entire fiscal year, and the committee says in the report that the appropriation and estimate was lowered at that time.

Now, while we are providing for other industries, while we are providing for other services, the Government ought to make a sufficient appropriation for this. We trust that the House at this date is not going to say that we are not entitled to this appropriation, that it is opposed to the mining industry, and that we are not to give the miner who takes the gold and silver from the earth an opportunity to dispose of it. He is the man who adds much to the wealth of the country without injuring anyone. We are not going to deprive him of an opportunity to dispose of this material. It has been a great thing for the West to have these mints and assay offices. We are talking to-day about markets, of having places for the disposal of material in good markets, where the producers can dispose of it at a proper price. And yet you are asked to turn backward, so far as this mineral industry is concerned, and you will if you do not appropriate for the proper maintenance and proper officering of the various mints. It is a case of the proper handling and shipment of bullion from place to place. If the Government buys it at Deadwood and needs it at Denver, it is the duty of this Government to see that the material is sent to Denver at its expense for the purpose of coining and using it, and not to give the express companies an opportunity to reach in and take what little profit the miner may make from taking it from the bowels of the earth. There is no man in this country to-day that has been of more service than has been the miner, and you ought not to take his opportunity away for disposing of this material or take away what little profit he may get out of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the question of expense in this matter is a small one. It is only $10,000 for the freight on coin and bullion—$1,000 for Carson, Nev., $1,000 for Boise, $500 for Deadwood, $1,000 for Helena, and $1,000 for Salt Lake. When the Government desires to coin money at San Francisco or at Denver it can go to Boise, it can go to Salt Lake or Deadwood, where the miners, right on the ground, can in turn go to these mints and deliver their gold bullion and obtain the coin of the realm, and then the Government in turn can send that bullion where it is desired for coinage.

We ought to give them every opportunity, we ought to permit everything that can be done which will give a better chance to bring more gold into the mint, where it will be coined, and we ought not to take the opportunity away from these people, who have a chance now to dispose of their bullion at the mine. I trust that these amendments will not be voted down, but that the House will recede and adopt the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, on general principles I am very much interested in and in favor of all the Senate amendments from 27 to 33, inclusive; but I am especially interested in amendment No. 30, which grants $1,000 additional for the contingent expenses at the assay office at Boise, Idaho. While we have great regard for the judgment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] with reference to the needs of the Government in the eastern section of the country, we of the West feel that he is not correctly advised regarding its needs in the western country. We feel that we are not given that consideration which we deserve. The assay office at Boise, Idaho, was established about 60 years ago. It has been a very important factor in the development and prosperity of that section of the country, as have the other assay offices throughout the West. The contingent expenses for last year and for previous years for the Boise assay office amounted to $2,500. In the agreement reached when the appropriation bill was under consideration last year with reference to the conduct of the Boise assay office it was decided that the general expenses should be cut down very materially in salaries and wages; but without any estimate from the Director of the Mint the committee arbitrarily fixed the amount for contingent expenses at $1,000, while heretofore, as I have said, it had been $2,500 per annum.

It is very easy to adjust the appropriation for salaries and wages by reducing the number of employees or the amount of their compensation, but when it comes to economizing on contingent expenses it is an entirely different proposition. This additional money for contingent expenses is needed for fuel, light, water, crucibles, acids, and other supplies incidental to running an assay office. These are items which must be furnished if the business of the office is to continue. I do not understand why the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] utterly disregards the recommendation of the Director of the Mint. He is at the head of this branch of the service and is in close touch with the needs of the various assay offices, and his recommendations are contained in the hearings that were had before the Senate Committee on Appropriations. He recommended the items which are contained in this bill and asserts that the proposed appropriation is necessary to conduct these assay offices.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I do not believe the House fully grasps the position of the gentleman, that the department recommended these items and that it is in the report.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. These items are all recommended by the Director of the Mint.

Mr. RAKER. As being necessary?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As being absolutely necessary, otherwise on the 1st of January, or at least by the 1st of February, these assay offices will have to cease business, because they will not have the money to pay for these supplies, and of course under the law a deficiency can not be contracted.

Senators from the Western States, the States that are interested in these amendments, were before the committee and their statements are contained in the hearings. They are men whose judgment should be entitled to consideration, as they are familiar with the needs of that section of the country; and yet it appears that the opinion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is to be followed instead of the opinion of the Representatives and Senators from the Western States.

Because of the curtailment of the appropriation in the assay office at Boise, Idaho, it has been necessary for the assayer in charge—a very distinguished man, who has heretofore been receiving a salary of $2,500, and who is one of the most honored and loved men in our State—to act as watchman at this assay office. He is unable to leave the office during office hours because of the important nature of his duties, and the only time he can leave the building is just about half an hour before the office closes and before the other employees leave. He is actually performing not only the duties of the assayer but the duties of a watchman at this office.

It seems to me that this appropriation should be granted; and if it is not all needed, of course it will not be expended; but to cripple the service by absolutely refusing to appropriate money to continue it seems to me to be a very singular and unusual way to transact the public business.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MOORE. If the appropriation should not be made and the office should be in effect abolished, where would the work hereafter be done?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Of course the work would then have to be sent to Denver or San Francisco. In that connection I wish to mention the great advantage it is to the prospectors in the western country to have some convenient place to which they can send their gold dust or bullion, if they should melt it into bullion in the camps.

Under existing conditions the prospectors, of which there are thousands roaming the hills of the Rocky Mountain country, can send in their gold dust or bullion by registered mail to these assay offices and get a draft back within two or three days, whereas if these assay offices are abolished they would have to send their bullion a long distance, and it would necessarily take from 10 days to 2 weeks to get returns. Thousands of these men have no other income than the result of their explorations in the ground in digging out the precious metals. They send this gold dust and bullion to the assay offices, just as a man in this section sends his products to the market. They depend upon their daily labor for their sustenance, and it is working great injustice upon the western country to curtail these offices and thus discourage prospecting and mining and cripple the service in the manner proposed. I therefore earnestly hope that the amendment proposed by the Senate will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it has been the policy of our Government ever since it was established to encourage the pioneer in his efforts to push forward to the frontier in the development of the country. In furtherance of this policy legislation was enacted lending Government aid to the construction of transcontinental railroads. A homestead law was enacted giving to every citizen 160 acres of public land without cost, excepting filing fees; and we have recently, I am glad to say, enacted legislation to establish a bureau in the Department of Agriculture to assist the farmer in finding a profitable market in which to sell his products. We are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars toward the eradication of disease among every kind of domestic animals. We are appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars toward counteracting the effects of injurious insects attacking our fruit trees and vegetation. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being appropriated for experimental stations and the employment of those having a technical knowledge of plant and vegetable life in the development of our agricultural resources. There is even in operation in connection with the Bureau of Immigration in this city and conducted at a great expense a system under which we are endeavoring to find an advantageous location for the foreigner as soon as he reaches our shores; and yet, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York and other Members on the Democratic side are endeavoring to take away from the prospector and miner the only encouragement he has ever received from the Government by abolishing the assay offices throughout the western country. Is no further consideration to be accorded to the intrepid prospector who endures the hardships and exposure to the elements incident to his calling, and as a result of whose labors a stream of gold has been pouring into the coffers of the Government for the past 60 years, simply because the receipts of these offices are not quite up to the expense of managing them? Why this discrimination against the prospector and miner? Why should you not be as willing to encourage this class of brave men as those in any other walk of life? By the abolishment of these assay offices you compel the prospector and miner to either sell his gold dust at whatever price he can get for it or endure the inconvenience incident to the delay of sending his dust thousands of miles to be assayed and made ready to be coined. If the proposed appropriation is refused by the Democratic majority, you will have struck a cruel blow at thousands of honest prospectors and miners who are endeavoring to bring forth the virgin wealth from the depths of the mountain States, and they will naturally reach the conclusion that the Democratic Party believes in retrogression rather than advancement, as these assay offices can not be continued in operation for many more months without the additional appropriation called for in the proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. JOHNSON] five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the Senate amendment in reference to these items mentioned in the bill will prevail. I will say at the outset that I have but little information as to some of these items, but I doubt not they are on a par and in a similar condition with the assay office at Salt Lake City. The assay office at Salt Lake City is a very important one. It has to deal with the bullion not only of the State of Utah, but from adjoining States—for instance, the eastern parts of Nevada and partially from other States—and it is the central market for the deposits of the bullion not only of the State of Utah but of some of the adjoining States. I am informed that this appropriation is absolutely necessary if these assay offices shall be continued in operation. Of course, if there shall be continued a market in a central location for the product of the miner, then there must be an assay office there in order to determine the value of the various kinds of bullion produced. It is, Mr. Speaker, a great industry not only of our State and of the States involved, but also of the Nation. I have before me the figures of the production of metals of the State of Utah for the year 1912, and I find that it amounts of $44,414,000, of which $4,300,000 is in gold bullion and $7,995,000 is of silver bullion, all of which requires a ready market, and a ready market can not be at hand unless there is some way of ascertaining the value of this bullion in some place approximately close to the point where the bullion is produced. I therefore sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, that this amendment of the Senate with reference to these items may prevail. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. STOUT].

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, there has been an effort made at several past Congresses to do away with the assay offices in the West. The usual method of procedure is simply to leave off the appropriation which would, of course, automatically put the offices out of business. The people who live in the West appreciate the very great necessity for these offices. There is one of them located in my State at Helena, Mont., through which approximately $2,000,000 worth of gold bullion passes every year, and the discontinuance of that office would work a tremendous hardship upon the hundreds or thousands of small miners in that State. To do away with this office and permit even the offices at Boise or Salt Lake City to remain in operation would mean the miners would still have to ship their bullion from 400 to 600 miles, whereby a great sum would be lost to them and a lot of inconvenience occasioned. The assay offices are provided for by law, and it seems to me to be entirely a wrong system that we shall wipe out a statute by failure simply to make the necessary appropriation. It would be the same thing if we were to fail to make appropriations for our courts. We would still have the judges and court rooms, but of necessity there could not be any courts held, so I trust that the House will adopt the amendment that has been submitted by the Senate.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Montana [Mr. STOUT] yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. STOUT. I will.

Mr. BARTON. As I understand the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], it carries with it the amendments from 28 to 33?

Mr. STOUT. All of them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Discussion on this subject has appealed to me, but I have not yet heard anyone discuss amendment No. 28. I would like to hear you discuss that.

Mr. STOUT. My colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], just a moment ago, I think, entered into that item quite fully, and since he is better acquainted with that particular item than I am, I should prefer to have him discuss it. I just simply wanted to call the attention of the House to the necessity for these offices and the necessity for these appropriations. If they do not get them, the offices will have to go out of business, which will work a hardship on all the mining industries of the Rocky Mountain States. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I hate to be persistent in a matter of this kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we have given these amendments all the time necessary.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. We have given time to the gentleman interested in this matter.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, did I use all the five minutes allotted to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman used only three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman who made the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. STOUT] that the Director of the Mint in his estimates makes special reference to the $10,000 appropriation, and says it is necessary in order to transfer the coin and bullion between assay offices and the mints. On page 5 of Document 88, which I will ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Record on this subject, it shows the necessity for all of these items. Then in the hearings before the Senate committee, commencing on page 29 with the statement of Mr. Roberts, Director of the Mint, to and including the end of Senator MYERS's statement on page 38, I will ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record as a part of my remarks. That shows that the Director of the Mint says that these items are necessary in order to maintain the work in these several mints as well as to transport the bullion and coin between the various assay offices and mints, and that the appropriation ought to be made. If the Government or if the present administration desires to change the matter and wipe out one of the great industries of the West, let that come up in proper form in the regular session later. But the administrative officer to-day says that this money is necessary; that it ought to be had in order to keep these offices going, for otherwise they will be closed down. I trust that the present administration will never lend its aid to the question of shutting up the mints and doing away with the mining interests in the West without giving, as my friend from Montana [Mr. STOUT], my friend from Utah [Mr. JOHNSON], and my friend from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] have said, the miner an opportunity to be heard as other classes of citizens of this country are heard.

Here we have the administrative officer behind this. Here we have the Senators appealing for it, who have appeared before the committee, and we have the Senate adopting this proposition, showing that it is necessary. I trust that in behalf of the great mining interests of the West, notwithstanding this is only $16,000, it will not be voted down. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that there was about $15,000 added to the New York assay office, and if it is necessary to continue the assay office in New York and add more money, and the same way in Philadelphia, why cut out the little offices in the West, where they are absolutely necessary?

The matter referred to is as follows:

Supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the various departments for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for deficiencies for prior years.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT—MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

Detailed objects of expenditure, and explanations.	Total amount to be appropriated under each head of appropriation.	Amount appropriated for the fiscal year for which the appropriation is required.
Freight on bullion and coin, mints and assay offices: For an additional amount for freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, for the fiscal year 1914 (act Mar. 4, 1913, vol. 37, pp. 761, 762, sec. 1).....	$15,000	$10,000
Contingent expenses, mint at Carson, Nev.: For an additional amount for incidental and contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1914 (same act).....	1,000	1,000
Contingent expenses, assay office at Boise, Idaho: For an additional amount for incidental and contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1914 (same act).....	1,000	1,000
Contingent expenses, assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: For an additional amount for incidental and contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1914 (same act).....	1,000	500
Contingent expenses, assay office at Helena, Mont.: For an additional amount for incidental and contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1914 (same act).....	1,000	1,000
Contingent expenses, assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah: For an additional amount for incidental and contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1914 (same act).....	1,000	1,000
Total mints and assay offices.....	20,000

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
OFFICE OF DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
Washington, May 9, 1913.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: The appropriations carried by the act of March 4, 1913, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, and for other purposes, include the sum of $10,000 for the use of the Bureau of the Mint in defraying the transportation of coin and bullion between assay offices and mints. The actual expenditures for this purpose during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, were $26,577.74; the appropriation for the current year is $25,000 and will all be required. The estimate for the fiscal year 1913-14 was $25,000; the reduction from this amount to $10,000 was originally made by the House of Representatives undoubtedly upon the theory that the assay offices at Deadwood, Helena, Boise, Salt Lake City, and Carson City would be abolished, but when these offices were restored to the bill by the conference committee the appropriation for the transportation was not increased. The result is that after the $10,000 available is exhausted, bullion will accumulate in these small offices, and must be held at considerable risk, as they are not equipped with vaults and safes of the most modern make, and the number of employees in each office must be reduced. An additional appropriation of $15,000 will be necessary for the transportation of coin and bullion.

In restoring the above-named assay offices to the appropriation bill, the conference committee made radical reductions, not only in salaries and wages, but in the fund for incidental and contingent expenses. It will probably be possible to continue to operate the offices throughout the coming year upon the amounts available for salaries and wages, but it will not be possible to reduce the expenditures from the contingent funds to the sums appropriated. These expenditures are for heat, light, water, crucibles, fluxes, and other necessary supplies, and if the amount of bullion handled by the offices is undiminished, the amount of these supplies can not be reduced to any important extent. It will be necessary to increase the appropriations for each of the above-named assay offices for incidental and contingent expenses by the sum of $1,000.

Section 3679, Revised Statutes, as amended (see vol. 33, pt. 1, p. 1257), requires, with some qualifications, that all appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes "shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly allotments as to prevent undue expenditures in one portion of the year that may require deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year."

In view of this state of affairs, I have the honor to recommend that the facts be reported to the Congress immediately in order that it may have opportunity during the present extra session to make the supplemental appropriations which will be necessary in order to handle the business of these assay offices throughout the fiscal year 1913-14.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. ROBERTS,
Director of the Mint.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE E. ROBERTS, DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

(Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS and Hon. KEY PITTMAN, Senators from the State of Nevada, and Hon. HENRY L. MYERS and Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH, Senators from the State of Montana, appeared.)

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Senator OVERMAN). Mr. Roberts, we will be glad to hear you. You have Document No. 88 before you?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir. The items on the assay offices are at page 5. Senator OVERMAN (to Senator NEWLANDS). Do you desire to be heard before Mr. Roberts proceeds?

Mr. ROBERTS. Perhaps you had better let me state the facts. Senator NEWLANDS. All right.

ASSAY OFFICES.

Mr. ROBERTS. My appearance, Mr. Chairman, is due to differences which arose between the Senate and House over the assay offices at the close of the last session in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. You will remember that differences arose, and the conferees were deadlocked up to the last day of the session.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; all right long.
Mr. ROBERTS. They finally came to an agreement in the last hours of the session by making a severe cut in the appropriations for five of the assay offices. Those cuts were made without any consultation with the department, and it is because the sums appropriated are inadequate to carry these offices through the year and in some respects to carry them even into the next session of Congress, that I appear before you.

Senator OVERMAN. They all ought to be abolished, however.
Mr. ROBERTS. That is not the question I suppose to-day.

Senator NEWLANDS. Oh, no.
Senator OVERMAN. The only way it seems to get rid of them is not to make the appropriations.

Mr. ROBERTS. It is for the reason stated that I thought it necessary to make a statement to you.

The House committee proposed to abolish the offices at Carson, Boise, Deadwood, Helena, and Salt Lake City. The bill passed the House in that state. The Senate restored the appropriations and finally in conference these cuts were made.

We had estimated that we would require $25,000 for the transportation of coin and bullion between the mints and assay offices. Nearly all of that is expended for the transportation of the bullion which is purchased at the assay offices to the mints. We buy the bullion at the assay offices; it becomes the property of the Government, and in order to become available at all of course it must be transported to a mint. We asked for $25,000 for that purpose, and the House cut it to $10,000, no doubt upon the theory that there were going to be five less assay offices than the previous year. Then they put back the five offices in the bill and did not restore the appropriation for the transportation of bullion. They gave us only $10,000 instead of the $25,000 we asked for and which will be necessary.

Senator OVERMAN. Are you buying any bullion at these offices?
Mr. ROBERTS. We are buying it. We have expended for the transportation of bullion since the 1st of July $6,876.69.

Senator OVERMAN. In three months?
Mr. ROBERTS. In less than three months. It will be three months at the end of September.

Senator PERKINS. To-day is the 22d.
Mr. ROBERTS. To-day is the 22d. Our appropriation for the transportation of bullion will be exhausted before Congress meets in regular session in December. These offices are not equipped with modern vaults or safes. We do not consider it desirable or prudent to be accumulating bullion in any considerable quantity there. It is absolutely necessary to transport the bullion.

Senator PERKINS. How much do you estimate is required?
Mr. ROBERTS. We ask for our original estimate, $25,000 in all, or $15,000 in this bill.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you transported more in the past three months than you will transport in the next three?

Mr. ROBERTS. Perhaps so. The summer season is rather heavier, but we will require the full appropriation of $25,000. There is some question whether it will be enough, but that was our original estimate.

Senator OVERMAN. How do you transport the bullion, by express?

Mr. ROBERTS. By express.
Senator OVERMAN. Express charges have gone down somewhat, have they not?

Mr. ROBERTS. I have not heard of it.
Senator PERKINS. It is claimed that the parcel post is ruining their business.

Senator OVERMAN. You could not ship bullion by parcel post?

Senator PERKINS. As a matter of fact, it has been shipped by registered mail.

Mr. ROBERTS. There is some bullion shipped by registered mail. The chief difficulty arises in the delivery from the post office to the mint. The postmaster at San Francisco declines to deliver the bullion to the mint; he will not assume that risk, and the superintendent of the mint declines to go to the post office for it and assume the risk himself, and there you are.

Senator PERKINS. That presents a rather embarrassing situation.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; that is very plain. How about the next item, contingent expenses, mint at Carson, Nev., $1,000?

Mr. ROBERTS. The conference committee made a very heavy reduction in wages and salaries; too heavy, in my opinion, but I have not asked for anything to supplement that for the remainder of this year. We have had two resignations as a result of it, but have been able to fill the places temporarily any way, and I think we can perhaps get through the year. But when it comes to incidental and contingent expenses they can not be arbitrarily reduced. Those are expenditures for fuel and lights and water and crucibles and acids and things of that kind. If the business of the offices keeps up, if their receipts are as heavy as they were before, those expenses will necessarily have to be just about what they have been in the past. All these things are bought under proposals from the lowest bidder, and I do not know how to reduce those expenses. We have asked for $1,000 additional. For instance, here is Boise. Last year—

Senator OVERMAN. But that is not a deficiency. You are asking for an additional appropriation, and that will come in the next regular appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator, the law is very strict about creating deficiencies nowadays. Furthermore, section 3679 provides—let me read the statute:

"No department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

"* * * All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made for the fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized by law without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent undue expenditures in one portion of the year that may require deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year. * * * Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than one month."

I doubt whether we ought to spend from month to month now more than the monthly proportion of the year's expenditure. We have been obliged to do so far, but I have felt warranted in doing it under the conditions, and I felt it was my duty to bring the facts before the committee.

These appropriations will not run one-half through the year. We will be out of money probably before the regular deficiency bill is acted upon at the next session, and inasmuch as it is now a criminal offense to create a deficiency I do not intend to create one myself in any office under my jurisdiction.

Senator OVERMAN. I wish all officers were like you.

Mr. ROBERTS. At the Boise office last year we had an appropriation of $2,500 for contingent expenses. This year it is cut to $1,000. The actual expenditures last year were $1,966.03. We have asked for another thousand dollars there.

At Helena last year we had an appropriation of $3,250. That was cut to $1,000. The actual expenditures last year were $2,328.58.

At Salt Lake City last year the appropriation was $3,500. The appropriation is $1,000. The actual expenditures were $2,711.35. We have asked for another thousand dollars there.

At Carson City last year the appropriation was $3,000. The actual expenditures were $1,997.12. We have asked for another thousand dollars.

At Deadwood the appropriation last year was $1,500. The amount now given is $500. The actual expenditures were $1,368.18. We have asked for another thousand dollars there.

Those appropriations are absolutely necessary if the offices are to be continued through the present fiscal year.

All of these reductions were effected, as I have said, in conference in a very hasty and arbitrary way, without any consultation with the department. I thought it was important that the committee should have the facts put before them, because the assay offices will have to be closed unless some additional funds are provided for them. I will turn the case over to Senators NEWLANDS and PITTMAN.

Senator NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Roberts a question or two?

Senator OVERMAN. You may ask him any question you desire, Senator NEWLANDS.

Senator NEWLANDS. Mr. Roberts, assuming that these appropriations that you asked for are made in this deficiency bill, what will be the total expense for the year of maintaining the five assay offices mentioned in the bill?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will give you the total by putting down the sum for each office.

Senator OVERMAN. $20,000 is what is asked.

Senator NEWLANDS. What was the total amount appropriated last year for the assay offices at Carson, Boise, Deadwood, Helena, and Salt Lake City?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will have to figure that out.
Mr. REA. The incidental and contingent expenses for Carson were $3,000; Boise, $2,500; Deadwood, $1,500; Helena, Mont., $3,250; and Salt Lake City, $3,500.

Senator NEWLANDS. Now, what is the total of that?

Senator OVERMAN. $13,750.

Senator NEWLANDS. Then $25,000 is to be added?

Mr. ROBERTS. The total expense would be $43,000 this year if you grant the additional appropriation we have asked.

Senator NEWLANDS. $43,000 for this year?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes; for all. That does not include the transportation of coin and bullion.

Senator NEWLANDS. That would be $15,000 more?

Mr. ROBERTS. It would be $25,000 more.

Senator NEWLANDS. Then what would be the total?

Mr. ROBERTS. $68,000.

Senator NEWLANDS. That includes the $20,000 you ask for now as a deficiency?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator NEWLANDS. Would those sums adequately provide for these assay offices?

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator, I think some of these salaries were cut too low, and if the offices are to be maintained there should be a little more money for the men. These are responsible positions. These men assay the bullion and pay for it. They are authorized to draw checks on the Treasury of the United States in payment for bullion. They buy several million dollars' worth in a year. They should be competent assayers and men of some standing and some responsibility.

Furthermore, there should be help enough in each office so that it is not all dependent upon one man. We would like to have two men competent to check each other. In assay work there should be one man there in case the other is sick, and there should be some opportunity for vacations, and so on. All that is wiped out by the reductions that were made in conference. But I have not asked for any reconsideration of the appropriation for wages or salaries this year.

Senator NEWLANDS. I simply inquire what sum would be required to adequately meet the demands at these assay offices for the purposes for which they are intended. How much would you add to the $68,000?

Mr. ROBERTS. Just let me make some figures and I will give you the total amount that was given to us last year, and that is not very far out of the way.

Senator OVERMAN (to Senator NEWLANDS). Do you propose to ask for an appropriation for that purpose in this bill?

Senator NEWLANDS. No; not in this bill. I thought it might be well to get the information just now for the committee and for ourselves.

Senator OVERMAN. You can send an estimate down in the next appropriation bill for all these items.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes; we will submit our estimate, of course, for the next year, but I will give you these figures. Our appropriations last year were $91,890.

Senator NEWLANDS. That was sufficient to meet all the requirements?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

Senator NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to present briefly the views of myself and my colleague regarding this matter. There is general legislation now upon the statute books providing for an assay office at each one of these places and fixing the salaries of the officials.

Senator OVERMAN. No.

Senator NEWLANDS. I think so.

Senator OVERMAN. A statute fixing the officers and all that, but the salaries are fixed in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill every year.

Mr. ROBERTS. Excuse me. I think the salaries were carried in the original act for a part of the officials anyway—the important ones.

Senator OVERMAN. For a part of them, not all of them.

Mr. ROBERTS. For the head of the office, I think, in nearly every case. Senator NEWLANDS. Yes; and probably you will find that the salaries of some of the subordinates were stated.

Senator OVERMAN. That may be.

Senator NEWLANDS. Congress has determined that these assay offices shall exist at these places. It has determined that there shall be certain officials at them. It has determined that those officials shall have certain salaries, and the implication, of course, is that the Appropriation Committee will annually appropriate all the moneys that are necessary to conduct those offices in order that they may satisfy the purpose of their existence.

There is but one orderly way of getting the will of Congress regarding the legislation that is now on the statute books, and that is either to repeal it or to amend it. What do we find? We find that the department, in the interest of economy and without taking the general welfare of the mining industry into consideration, has recommended annually that these assay offices shall be abandoned.

Now, what is the orderly way of complying with that recommendation? It is to introduce a bill to repeal the existing law. Instead of that we have been compelled practically to submit to the will of but one body, and that is the House, because the Senate has uniformly been against the repeal of the legislation. So we find the law practically annulled by the action of the House, and that annulment is secured through the coercion of the Senate. I say it is time that the Senate should, in defense of its own dignity as well as in the maintenance of the law, take a firm stand against that position.

Senator OVERMAN. It did last year.

Senator NEWLANDS. It did; but it had to surrender at last.

Senator OVERMAN. No; we have not surrendered.

Senator NEWLANDS. I mean to say it had to yield, in a measure.

Senator OVERMAN. It yielded in the amount of money appropriated.

Senator NEWLANDS. I understand. I am not casting any reflections upon the Senate committee, because under all the circumstances it did the best it could, but it seems to me the fight ought to be renewed. We have this fight now, and the Senate ought to take a firm stand. It seems to me the thing to do is to put here in the deficiency bill the amounts that the department says are necessary in order to properly conduct these offices and to insist upon their retention in the bill.

If this matter comes up in an orderly way before the proper committee, for the first time the men in the mining States will be allowed an opportunity to be heard before a committee that is constituted for the purpose of hearing that particular matter. The Committee on Appropriations, of course, is called upon to make the appropriations authorized by law. It has nothing whatever to do with the original legislation, of course, upon these subjects. If we can go before the proper committee, then we will have the opportunity to present this matter.

Mr. ROBERTS. The conferees did reach an agreement that the offices should be maintained, and I think it was purely through inadvertence that the appropriations were cut as much as they were. The reduction for the transportation of bullion, I take it, was a matter of pure inadvertence.

Senator NEWLANDS. It may be so, but I assume that the real purpose was to cripple this service.

Mr. ROBERTS. The House intended to abolish the offices.

Senator NEWLANDS. As I said, if these matters should come up before the proper committee, a committee having jurisdiction, the men representing the mining regions would then have an opportunity to present not only the question of economy of administration but also to present the question of meeting a great public want. The National Government has throughout its legislation done certain things in the interest of certain occupations and industries. It has treated the agricultural industry as one that ought to be sustained. It is appropriating millions of dollars annually for educational and experimental work regarding agriculture. The mining industry is one just as important, and it is a more important one in those States.

What we contend is that the consideration addressed to this subject should not be merely as to how the Treasury Department can be most economically administered, but what proper legislation the Congress of the United States should adopt with a view to meet the conveniences and the wants of the great mining industry. Of course, all that could be presented before the Committee on Appropriations, but it would necessarily prolong your hearings. However, there is a side to be presented, and most vigorously presented, on behalf of the mining States. We do not present it to you now or to the entire committee simply because we think that there is an orderly way of presenting it.

Senator OVERMAN. I fully agree with you. I took that position before, as you will remember.

Senator NEWLANDS. I know.

Senator OVERMAN. But the House insisted upon it, and we had to reduce the allowance. Now, having succeeded in our fight to hold these offices, the only question is whether we will increase this appropriation, which was a matter of compromise. It seems to me that the Secretary has made a good showing here for increasing the contingent expenses.

Senator NEWLANDS. I think so, and also for the transportation charge.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH.

Senator WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I had some correspondence some time ago with Mr. Miller, the assayer in charge at Helena.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have his letter making his bottom estimate of what he could get along with for ordinary contingent expenses. They have given us only $1,000. He has placed $2,200 as the least he can get along with. However, I have cut him $200. My estimate is $2,000.

Senator NEWLANDS. I was just contending that these assay offices are authorized by law, that the salaries are fixed by law, and the functions of the officers are fixed by law, and, of course, those laws should not be practically annulled by legislation on an appropriation bill. The orderly way would be to bring in a bill and have it considered by the proper committee, where all parties interested in the measure could be heard.

Senator WALSH. As a surrender of the functions of government, it would be exactly the same as if Congress refused to make an appropriation for the salaries of judges. Of course the judgeships would still exist, the courts would exist, but you could not do anything. They stand upon exactly the same footing. As you see, these assay offices were established by law, and the law fixes the salaries, and if you do not make provision for them it is simply the same as if you did not make provision for other necessary governmental functions.

Senator NEWLANDS. It is my understanding that the entire people of the mining region regard these assay offices as great aids to convenience in the mining industry.

Senator WALSH. Of course; 40 years' experience has demonstrated their utility and the necessity for them.

Senator OVERMAN. We have one at Salt Lake City, one at Deadwood, S. Dak., one at Boise, one at Helena, and one at Carson. I fully agree with you. The Senate has taken the same position, and by reason of it we have succeeded in holding these offices after a very hard fight lasting for four weeks here. I will ask you if, in your opinion, we could get along without so many of these assay offices? They are all situated in that particular territory. There is one at Helena and one at Deadwood. How about the one at Deadwood?

Senator WALSH. Of course I do not undertake to speak about the one at Deadwood, but you can readily see how that would operate. Take the assay office at Deadwood. Of course there is no territory tributary to that except the Black Hills. Suppose you abolish the assay office at Deadwood. Every man who goes out and works a little prospect in the hills and establishes a mill there operates it by the cyanide process or amalgamation. He takes his retort, and he has then got to either ship it, with the chances of loss, to Salt Lake City or to Helena or to some of the other places, or else he has got to sell it to a dealer. The opportunities are not given for testing the fineness and that kind of thing. Naturally it is a loss to him, and it is a discouragement to prospecting and to the development of the mines in that region.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not the truth that notwithstanding they have this assay office they ship, say, 100 miles, and they would only have to ship it farther?

Senator WALSH. Of course there is this to be said about Deadwood. The Homestake Mine, I presume, represents perhaps 90 per cent of the output of the Black Hills region, and probably they are fairly well equipped to handle their business and to take care of shipments by express, and all that. So I do not undertake to speak of that. I do not know exactly how it is, but take any of these other offices. Take the assay office at Carson City, Nev., for instance. I do not know where those people would go with their dust from their placer mines or their retorts or their bullion in case of amalgamation or the cyanide process. The assay office at San Francisco would be of no use to them. They might just as well send to the mint at Philadelphia.

Senator PITTMAN. Another element enters into it, and that is delay in the receipt of returns. I will state simply as an illustration that I was operating a placer proposition in Nevada. It is a placer proposition where there is just a little profit out of it, and a man must have a quick return to keep his mine going. The idea is that they can get their bullion turned in on Saturday and get their money back on Monday, so that they can keep their crews going. I know other men operating in that country the way I was doing business sent some of their bullion to San Francisco and they found it very impracticable, because it would be a week or 10 days before they got a return, and that made a big difference to them.

Senator WALSH. Of course there is only a right understanding of this matter in the locality, and that is only by reason of the fact that that is the only place where there is any occasion for it.

Senator OVERMAN. We had one in my own State which was abolished. Of course we have a good deal of it in my State, and we ship to Philadelphia, 500 miles away.

Senator WALSH. It is not any farther from your State to the mint in Philadelphia than it is between any of the assay offices here. The nearest to us would be Salt Lake City, which is about 450 miles from Helena.

Senator OVERMAN. How about Boise?

Senator WALSH. Boise would be 100 miles farther.

Senator FITZGERALD. We have a lot of buildings in most of those places, and the expense of keeping watchmen to watch those buildings would call for an appropriation which would go far in carrying on the office.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF GEORGE E. ROBERTS, DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Senator OVERMAN. I think Mr. Roberts has made a good showing, and I am inclined to allow his estimate as far as I am concerned.

Mr. ROBERTS. Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the conference committee agreed that the offices should be maintained, and I take it they supposed that the amount allowed would be enough to maintain them. They seem to have thought that a great economy might be effected. Whatever one may think about the necessity for these offices, and there may be some difference of opinion about that, if they are going to be conducted there ought to be money enough to conduct them properly, and I think there certainly should be an appropriation sufficient to carry them through this fiscal year.

Senator OVERMAN. You have been in favor of abolishing these offices. I should like to have these Senators from mining States hear the reasons why you think they should be abolished.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am perfectly willing to go into that, if you think this is the proper time to do it, but really I have never talked with the present Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject, and I do not feel that I am authorized to express the view of the department upon it.

Senator OVERMAN. I will not insist upon it.

Mr. ROBERTS. The one thing that is before us now is the question of supplying money enough to continue these offices through the present fiscal year. I am trying my best to get that. When the regular appropriation bill comes up next winter for the following fiscal year then the whole question of the policy in regard to these offices would properly come up.

Senator OVERMAN. I see why you should confer with the Secretary of the Treasury, because he might have a different opinion in regard to it.

Mr. ROBERTS. He may have. It seems to me that the proper thing to do is to give us the money that is absolutely necessary, if you make the estimate as low as possible, to carry these offices through the present fiscal year.

Senator WALSH. In fact, on examining the rolls at Helena I am surprised at the meager salaries that are paid to maintain that office.

Senator NEWLANDS. They are very small.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think they cut the salaries too low. I have stated that here.

Senator WALSH. An assayer gets $1,800 a year, $150 a month.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HENRY L. MYERS.

Senator MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be put on record as being in very hearty accord with Senators WALSH, NEWLANDS, and FITZGERALD in this matter. I am satisfied that these offices ought to be continued. I am very much impressed with what Mr. Roberts has said, that appropriations ought to be made to run through the current year, and then at the regular session of Congress next winter the present administration will have an opportunity to consider the policy to be adopted in regard to them. This administration was not in power a year ago when the attempt was made to cut them off. I think the appropriations ought to be made for the full year, and then let the administration go on record. The offices ought to be permitted to have sufficient funds to run until the end of the fiscal year without being crippled in their work.

I know that in Montana this is a matter of very great importance, and I assume it is equally so in Idaho, Utah, Nevada, and other mining States. It would be a very great handicap to the mining men of Montana to be deprived of their assay office. I hope that the appropriation will be rounded out at least for the current year.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you, gentlemen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] who is so much interested in the mints and assay offices should be aware of the fact that there is no mint in New York City, and that there is no allowance for any mint in New York City in this bill, or for the mint in Philadelphia. If it were intended merely to arouse the prejudices of Members of the House, at least it should be based upon facts and not merely upon some imaginary things coined from the brain of the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; not at present. I wish to make a statement of a few moments to the House. These useless assay offices have been pressed for abolition for the last five or six years. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1912, summing it up, says:

On the whole these offices involve an expense to the Treasury altogether disproportionate to the slight service rendered to the mining industry in whose supposed interest they are maintained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will not yield to the gentleman at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAKER. But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman take his seat.

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I decline to yield to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman can not take me off my feet in that way.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not yield to the gentleman from California at this time.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any way to get the Speaker's attention at all?

The SPEAKER. Not until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. RAKER. With any kind of a statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt the gentleman from New York without his consent.

Mr. RAKER. Well, my purpose is to call the Speaker's attention to a certain matter. Is there not a chance to get the Speaker's attention at all?

The SPEAKER. Not when another gentleman has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. Is there not a chance on a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. RAKER. I have seen it done here ever since I have been a Member of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not propose to have gentlemen interfere with my rights on the floor, however much they may do it with others. It seems impossible for anybody to attempt to make a connected statement lasting more than one minute without some gentleman, convinced that he knows so much more than everybody else in the House, desiring either to make a speech under the guise of a question or under a so-called parliamentary inquiry [applause], and a gentleman can not be heard while some one else is on the floor without his consent, because two men can not speak at one time under the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have been fairly liberal to Members interested in these items, considering the stage of the business at this session. While I have no desire to be discourteous, but to give gentlemen an opportunity to present their views, gentlemen should at least respect my request that I be permitted to make a statement about this matter to the House, and I shall not yield for interruptions until I have completed the statement. I wish to give notice to the House generally that I do not propose at any time to have gentlemen, upon the presumed right to present a parliamentary inquiry, take me from the floor or interrupt me in my right to the floor when I have it. They have no right to do it, and I shall not tolerate, so far as I am concerned, such interruptions when I occupy the floor. It is becoming an intolerable nuisance to everybody.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Is it permissible to inquire of the Chair and raise a point of order when a gentleman is not discussing at all the question at issue before the House?

The SPEAKER. That point of order is always in order.

Mr. RAKER. I just supposed from what the gentleman said that it was impossible to suggest anything when he was on his feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I protest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. RAKER. We are both in the same condition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from California has a point of order that is applicable, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. RAKER. My point of order is, whether or not it is in order for any gentleman to be scolding and lecturing Members on something that does not apply to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not making a point of order at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, to return now to these worthless assay offices, two years ago, after a very thorough investigation, the Committee on Appropriations recommended that all of the assay offices, including the one at Seattle and the one which was operated in connection with the San Francisco Mint, be abolished. There was no question as to the propriety of that action, but there were so many different offices involved, affecting sections of the country represented by so many Members of Congress, and certain other collateral issues assisting in the matter that the House restored all of these offices to the bill. In the last session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations reported the bill without any provision being made for those at Boise, Idaho, Helena, and Salt Lake City. The Deadwood office was in the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and the appropriation for that office was stricken out in the House. After the legislative bill went to the Senate the Senate inserted, by way of amendment, appropriations for the maintenance of all of these offices in amounts equal to the amounts that had been appropriated for the prior year. In the adjustment of differences between the two Houses the amounts allowed for these various offices were reduced by the sums which now appear in this bill as Senate amendments. In other words, the Senate having made certain concessions in the legislative bill, in order to obtain concessions from the House so that an agreement might be reached, now undertakes to take back the things that it gave up as a consideration for certain action by the House. Gentlemen are very much mistaken when they assert that these assay offices are necessary or essential or highly valuable to the mining industry. The testimony that has been adduced before the committees of Congress is that they are of unnecessary expense and that the work can be much better and more economically conducted by the abolition of these particular offices.

These offices have had some provision made for them, and the Director of the Mint says that in order to have them maintained and conducted at the same capacity that they were conducted during the preceding year it is necessary that these amounts be appropriated. But the purpose of the Congress was indicated that they should not be conducted at the same capacity, and this was the first step taken toward the abolition of these offices. If they are ever to be abolished, if they are ever to be eliminated because they are unnecessary, it seemed necessary that it be done by degrees. Unless the House wishes to reverse its action, ignore the recommendations of everyone who has been connected with the service and who has been endeavoring to eliminate unnecessary and useless services, it will not restore these items, but will insist upon the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment. Now, I am willing to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be in a position to ask the gentleman from New York a question and make a statement. I know the gentleman from New York would not under any circumstances make a statement that he thought was not borne out by the facts, and he would not accuse me of making a statement that the facts did not warrant. I want to call attention to the fact that the law provides in the public act 437 for an assay office at New York, with an expenditure in the neighborhood of $1,000 at one place, $80,000 at another, and $60,000 at another. I want to call attention to the further fact that the Director of the Mint has himself stated, on page 50 of the hearings before the subcommittee on the bill for 1914, after giving the names of those that are reduced:

At New York there is an increase of $14,250. The statute provides for an assay office at New York, for an expenditure very near $150,000.

And I know that the gentleman from New York did not intend to make the statement—

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from California did not speak of an assay office at New York; he said a mint.

Mr. RAKER. If I said so, it was a lapsus linguae.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose everybody understands that there is an assay office at New York. There is a reason for it. There is more gold brought into the city of New York, perhaps, than any other city in the United States where there is an assay office. The constant shipping of bullion to this country from Europe in settlement of trade balances makes it absolutely essential that the Government have facilities for assaying and determining the value of that bullion which is used in the settlement of customhouse duties.

Mr. RAKER. That being so relative to New York, which we all admit, why should not the little communities of the West have some place that they may have a clearing house and settle their differences and dispose of their bullion? Give the little fellow a chance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not at all essential for the little communities to have an assay office, but it is essential to have an assay office at New York. If some other port had the commercial supremacy possessed by the port of New York, that is where the assay office and refinery should be. It is anticipated that with the completion of the improvements being made there in time there will be $1,000,000,000 of gold stored in that office. Provision is being made for a much larger amount. The assay office is there because the transportation from Europe to this country of gold, both in bullion and coin, makes it essential, so that when an attempt is made to settle balances in gold it can be assayed at once. I think the House understands the situation, and I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In view of the fact that the Director of the Mint has stated that the amount appropriated for the contingent expenses under the last appropriation bill would be expended by the 1st of January or February, what does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations propose to do with reference to continuing these offices until the close of the fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the law provides that appropriations for contingent expenses shall be apportioned so as to prevent the expenditure of more in any one quarter or period of the year than in another; and how the Director of the Mint proposes to expend this money all in the first six months of the year without violating the law I am unable to comprehend. If he obeys the law, he can not expend the contingent fund in the first six months; and if he proposes to do it, then he should suffer the penalty provided by the statute. He should be compelled to retire from office.

Mr. Speaker. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendments 27 to 33, both inclusive, and concur in the same.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 44, noes 94.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nine Members; not a sufficient number, and the motion of the gentleman from California is rejected.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments 27 to 33, both inclusive.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. SLEMP, for two days, on account of important business.

Mr. ALEXANDER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 44:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Arming and equipping the militia, allotment State of Ohio: For replacing military stores, supplies, and equipments lost by the National Guard of the State of Ohio during the recent floods in Ohio during March and April, 1913, $78,670.87.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 44.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment 44 and concur in the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I need not call the attention of the House to the fact that we had a flood, or what might be more properly termed a calamity, in Ohio during the later part of March and the first part of April of this year, and that the loss in life and property due to that flood was tremendous. The State was weighed down under the great calamity. The Nation at large was charitable, and through the Red Cross Society funds and supplies poured in at this time of our distress.

This amendment provides:

For replacing military stores, supplies, and equipments lost by the National Guard of the State of Ohio during the recent flood in Ohio during March and April, 1913, $78,670.87.

The National Guard, 6,000 strong, was ordered out at the time of the flood, and I can testify to the efficiency and bravery of three companies of the Seventh Regiment, Col. Harry Knox commanding, in my home town of Marietta, where, with 15,000 inhabitants, three-fourths of the city in area and population was under water for five days. These men in skiffs that were frail and inadequate rescued, under my own observation, women and children from the roofs of houses coming down the Muskingum River in a terrific current. These men were in service for some six weeks, over the State. There were several cities and sections of the State in the same condition that we were in. They used up clothing, shoes, and overcoats and other equipment because they were forced to labor in a sea of mud, which was naturally very destructive to all kinds of wearing apparel.

Now, perhaps I might say for the information of the House that, under section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, $2,000,000 are annually appropriated for the National Guard of the country, and under the Dick law $2,000,000. The first amount is given out to the several States in proportion to their Congressmen and Senators, and under the other, the Dick law, in proportion to the registered strength of the Organized Militia of the State, not including the officers. The State of Ohio appropriates annually about $248,000 for the National Guard, and in this disaster she appropriated in addition $350,000 for the National Guard. The fact that the National Government recognizes the National Guard in appropriations annually under one bill for rifle practice and under another for Army supplies and equipment justifies us, in my opinion, in coming before the House and asking that the supplies, clothing, and equipment that were lost or rendered unfit for use through the service of the men in the flood should be replaced by the National Government. It is, in other words, asking the Government to put back the National Guard in the shape it found itself at the beginning of the flood.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. WHITE. I will.

Mr. SHARP. Is it not also true in that connection that very recently the Secretary of War has written a letter indorsing this proposition and this appropriation?

Mr. WHITE. I understand so. The appropriation, I might have stated, has the indorsement of the Secretary of War.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is for the purpose of replacing munitions, matériel, and arms furnished by the National Government to the Ohio National Guard?

Mr. WHITE. I so understand it.

Mr. TOWNER. In other words, the situation is this: The National Government has supplied the Ohio National Guard with this equipment, and so forth, for service. It was destroyed by the flood, and all that is now asked is that the Government should make this appropriation to place them in the condition they were before the flood occurred.

Mr. WHITE. That is correct. The accounts have been audited by the Quartermaster's Department of the Army and we feel justified in asking the House to concur in the Senate amendment and to put back the National Guard of Ohio so that in case of call, which we all hope will not occur, she will be ready to go to the front as Ohio has always been ready to go to the front in defense of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay my tribute, from personal observation, to the merits of the bill in question. In common with many people in my State, and possibly in other States, I may have had an insufficient idea of the value of the citizen soldiery. But in my congressional district two towns suffered the most from the flood which swept the Ohio Valley. They were the cities of Dayton and Hamilton; and with the receding of the muddy waters the civil government was entirely lost, and the first thing which the people did was to stretch out their arms for aid and make appeals to the National Government and the State government for troops; and I am proud to say that both responded in a most fitting way; and the Government of the United States is to be commended by the people of all the country for the service it rendered on that occasion in the Ohio Valley; and the National Guard of the State of Ohio, every company partaking of the work there, is to be commended for its work in behalf of its stricken fellow citizens. Now, I know that the National Guard of the State of Ohio stayed from four to seven weeks in mud and in water and discharged the duties imposed upon them as courageously as it was possible for them to do, and I know that when the waves went down and the waters receded that along with this temporary cessation from flood came the visitation of the ghoul and the looter, and the cities of Dayton and Hamilton and Marietta and Zanesville and Columbus, in the State of Ohio, were entirely at the mercy of the marauder, and it was none other than the National Guard which stood firm in the protection of the lives and the property of my fellow citizens. And I know that the merits of this bill must appeal to every man upon this floor, because it is not a thing of obtaining something for nothing; it is a matter of placing the National Guard of Ohio back where they were, so that they can perform military duty again.

These uniforms, the issues of equipment, everything necessary for their aid in action, had been apportioned to them by the Federal Government. They have been destroyed. The National Guard of Ohio faces an urgent deficiency in uniforms and necessary equipment. The men are there, the spirit of self-sacrifice is there, the desire to aid their fellow citizens is there, but the equipment is gone, rendered useless and destroyed by the action of the Ohio flood; and in this connection now, all that is asked in this bill—

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman just a moment?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman give us some idea—of course I have no doubt they did a great deal—of how much the State of Ohio had appropriated to aid these sufferers? It did its duty, no doubt.

Mr. GARD. To aid the sufferers?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; or the National Guard.

Mr. WHITE. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. GARD. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars has been appropriated to aid the National Guard, I understand. The State of Ohio and every other State in the American Union, as well as foreign countries, have been swift to respond to appeals for aid not alone for the State of Ohio but other States in the Union stricken by this flood, and this speaks most highly for the spirit of brotherhood which should prevail between us.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, do I understand that you have voted $300,000 for the use of the National Guard that would not have been voted except for the flood?

Mr. GARD. No; I think not.

Mr. WHITE. Yes. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does that go for?

Mr. WHITE. It goes for transportation and subsistence.

Mr. SHERLEY. For the work they did then and there. But what have you done toward equipment? Have you done anything?

Mr. WHITE. I do not believe so. That came on a national appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the fact that you received the gift in the first instance makes a reason for the gift in the second instance?

Mr. GARD. It is a continuing appropriation, I think.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman must understand it is not a gift. It is a payment under the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is a gift by a law or it could not come out of the Treasury. It is a gift to the State for the use of the National Guard, and your position is, having made the gift in one instance, because the National Guard has been used for State aid and in such use has destroyed this equipment, it should be paid over again?

Mr. GARD. My position is that the equipment of the National Guard, being a part of the equipment that belongs to the Government, and that equipment being destroyed, it should be restored to the National Guard where it belongs.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much did the State of Ohio contribute as a result of the flood, for all causes?

Mr. GARD. I am unable to state the exact amount contributed by the State of Ohio, but the sum expended ran into the millions of dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman very much mistaken when he says it ran into millions of dollars? I think this is important for the House to know. The State is one of the richest States in the Union and able to take care of itself splendidly, and I have no doubt it has done so.

Mr. GARD. It has.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I think it is rather material to know what it has expended. The Government has gone to great expense already in connection with the flood, and if the gentleman can give me the information I would like to know how much was paid out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? I am asking for information, as I want to vote intelligently on this matter. As I understand it, under the law certain equipment was given to the National Guard of Ohio by the National Government?

Mr. GARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. May I correct that? It was loaned.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was loaned. It is no matter. They went out on this flood duty, and while engaged in that duty the equipment was destroyed, and the proposition now is, as I understand it, that the Government ought to replace it, is it not?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thoroughly agree with that. I wanted to understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GARD. So that the House may understand, I will say that it is merely to place the National Guard of Ohio in the condition it was before the coming of this most disastrous flood.

As to the interrogation made by the gentleman from Kentucky as to Ohio taking care of its people, I am frank to say—I am proud to say—that the State of Ohio and all of its people rallied to the protection of those in the stricken districts. But I am also proud to say that every State in this American Union, wherever the news of this disaster was heard, rallied likewise to the relief of the stricken cities in Ohio and Indiana and Kentucky and Illinois and wherever men were oppressed by this mighty flood, so that it is not alone the United States which has done its part, and I am free to admit that it has, but the people of the States and the individuals in all the States; and every man who realized his duty toward a brother man in distress has done his little part; and from all of this there has been builded up such a contribution as to rehabilitate not only the actual loss, but to give us back our confidence and hope for the future, so that the people of Ohio face with the utmost confidence that which is to come in the years which are before us.

And regarding the immediate merits of this bill I may only impress upon the Members of this House that it is simply to restore the Ohio National Guard to a position where they may be again active in the public defense or in the public protection. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a plain business proposition. The Government of the United States under the law gave to the State of Ohio certain equipment. An itemized list of all the equipment that was lost in this flood appears in the RECORD. This list was sworn to by all the officers required to certify to it, including the adjutant general and the governor of the State of Ohio. It was shown that in some armories the water had risen as high as 13 feet, and while much equipment was lost in active duty by men in the field carrying on the work of saving lives and property, a great deal of this equipment was lost in the armories themselves.

Now, I believe that in the future the country will rely for the common defense largely on the militia in the States, our great reserve forces.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If I understand the matter correctly, the equipment that was lost was the equipment owned by the Government and loaned to the State?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes. That is the statement in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, that is correct, but it was furnished under authority of a law passed by Congress, and the militia being a part of the Army of the United States, it is done by the direct law and authority of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Of course; loaned by authority of Congress; but the National Guard is to account to the Government for the equipment.

Mr. BARTLETT. The governor of the State, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] will permit me, is responsible for it, and the various officers of the National Guard are compelled to give to the governor of the State a bond to account for all this equipment.

Mr. MANN. That is what I said. The National Guard is responsible for it.

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, if the gentleman will permit for just a second.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BATHRICK. The Secretary of War has written a letter relieving the governor of Ohio, the adjutant general, and all officers from responsibility for this equipment that was lost in the flood, and I think it remains only for the Government of the United States to make good under those circumstances. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. What is the effect of this proposition? Is it to further relieve or to refurnish equipment?

Mr. BATHRICK. To refurnish the equipment that was lost and given by the Government.

Mr. MANN. The equipment having belonged to the Government and being loaned to the National Guard, to be accounted for, and having been destroyed by this flood, the question is whether the Government will now reequip the National Guard?

Mr. BATHRICK. Exactly; and the Government, through the proper officer, the Secretary of War, has relieved the State of Ohio of responsibility for this lost equipment, and now it is desired that that equipment be replaced, not only for the good of the State of Ohio, which is a part of our national defense, but also because it is for the good of the whole country in maintaining our reserve militia.

The Secretary of War, under authority given him by law, having relieved the State, as shown, the Federal Government has assumed responsibility.

It is not requested that the State be the recipient of charity; we simply request that the National Guard in the Ohio branch of the whole service be not allowed to lapse into inefficiency because of disaster by act of God.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I have read the hearings before the House committee upon this appropriation, and it does seem to me as though there was no substantial reason why this amendment should not be agreed to. I do not know that I can add to—certainly not improve—the graphic description of my colleague [Mr. GARD] who comes from a city that was inundated by this tremendous flood. I am not in a position to give an adequate description of the horrors of it, because my home lies to the northward, high upon the shores of Lake Erie; but there was a common and sympathetic response all over Ohio. When the question was asked by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] as to the amount of money expended by the State, I think possibly my friend and colleague [Mr. GARD] misunderstood when he replied that there were several million dollars expended. It was hardly responsive. There were several million dollars expended by the citizens of the State of Ohio, but I presume there were several hundred thousand dollars directly expended by the State government. But lest we lose sight of the material point at issue here, let me call attention to it.

This is not a gift. This is not for the personal benefit of any one of the 6,000 members devoted to the common defense, not alone of the State of Ohio but the entire Union. It is simply a replacing of goods that were destroyed, equipment that was destroyed, not by any fault of theirs, but through the active service performed and in obedience to the sworn duty of these guardsmen in an overwhelming catastrophe. The Secretary of War officially indorses this appropriation. Only a few weeks ago we remember that we had a serious threatened trouble down on the southwest border of the United States. The Ohio National Guard became very prominent at that time. It was ready at a moment's notice to supplement the national forces, to take up arms in our defense.

I sometimes think there is an unjust criticism upon the National Guard. They are pictured by their detractors as men who have very little, if anything, to do. I hope that they will never have anything to do in the terrible execution of war, because that would mean perpetual peace, contentment, and happiness. But the crucial test comes when they do have something to do, and I want to say not only for that of my own State of Ohio but for the National Guard throughout the country that it is made up of excellent citizens, and if we ever have a war or serious outbreaks their services will be appreciated as they never have been in the past. In agreeing to this amendment we simply enable them to better carry out the duties that the institution was created to perform. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, if the Members of this House could have been in Ohio, either about Dayton or Hamilton or Columbus or Marietta or Delaware or Portsmouth, or any other of the cities along the Ohio River, with the tributaries entering, and especially along the Miami River, there would not be, I think, very much hesitancy in what the House would do on this amendment. The horrors of that flood are simply indescribable. In the city of Dayton, represented by our honored friend Mr. GARD, the water was up beyond the second story, and all through one section of that city to-day, although it is rejuvenated very largely, you will notice that the water mark is up very nearly to the roof on the second story of the building. The same thing can be said of the city of Hamilton, and I hope that the reports that Hamilton may not be able to rejuvenate itself are not correct. But if she does, it will be one of the most striking examples of regeneracy of business and enterprise that we can find anywhere in America, for that city was almost totally destroyed.

Right in the city of Dayton, down Third Street, the water was simply a river, flowing with a tremendous current, something like 30 miles an hour, and over in the city of Delaware some great building was lifted and started down through one section, sweeping a swath of destruction, taking every building that it struck, until through the city there was a river channel not alone of flowing water but no houses whatever left.

The same thing can be said of the city of Columbus; and during this terrific flood a tremendous loss of property occurred, including the loss that we are asking now to have replaced. I do not believe that we ought to ask for a defense of the National Guard. That is not a question now; but it does seem to me that those men who were out on duty, taking care of lives in jeopardy by a destructive flood, that had already appealed to the Red Cross Society and to all the humanistic organizations of the country, and which had received responses to appeals from East, South, West, and North, ought now to be taken into consideration, and that such devastation as that ought to strike a chord of sympathy here, and that we ought to replace this loss, for which no one is responsible. I do not think we ought to do it simply as a defense for any organization especially, but rather to recognize the good work that those men did in their performance of duty in trying to save the lives of the residents of those destitute communities. Therefore I hope that we will not think that this is Ohio asking relief, or any State or section asking it, or any organization asking it, but rather that it is a duty on the part of our Government, in the interest of appreciation and efficient service, to step in and relieve, in a sense, the deplorable condition produced by that flood, especially when it is not doing any more than it had already done before the flood came. Why should not the Government come in now and assist, when the property literally belonged to the Government and when it was destroyed by no fault of anyone? I trust there will be no serious opposition to the Government taking this position, which seems to be in the interest of humanity and national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is annually appropriated by the National Government some $4,000,000 to aid the National Guard in the respective States. Of this amount the State of Ohio receives annually about $166,000. The law provides that when the equipment is issued under this appropriation to the various States the State is required to give security to account for this equipment. If the equipment be lost or destroyed or rendered worthless by wear or obsolescence without fault by the State, the War Department under the law has authority to relieve the State from liability for the equipment. If the equipment be lost or destroyed or can not be accounted for in some way that can be justified, that State must make good. In this case the Department of War has relieved the State of Ohio from liability for the equipment. The sole question involved here is whether Congress should appropriate $78,000 additional to the National Guard of Ohio over the allotment to which the State is entitled under the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the State of Ohio is required to re-equip this National Guard, there will be no benefit that would accrue to Ohio by reason of being released by the War Department, will there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman uses a peculiar expression—"if the State of Ohio is required to re-equip this National Guard." The appropriation made by the Federal Government is not the primary appropriation. It is an aid to the National Guard of the respective States. The respective States have been jealous of their rights to organize and control their own militia, and they have not surrendered to the Federal Government many things that some contend should be surrendered. This same question will arise in this way: Suppose a fire takes place and an armory and the equipment contained in the armory is destroyed. Under the law the Federal Government would release the State from liability for the equipment. Should the Federal Government also increase the annual appropriation to replace that equipment? Suppose the National Guard in some State were called out for service in a strike and that during the strike there would be such service as would result in the same destruction or use of the tents and overalls and trousers, uniforms, and equipment, as has taken place in this flood service. Would anyone contend that the Congress, in addition to relieving the State from liability, should make an additional appropriation to resupply the equipment thus used? No, Mr. Speaker; the theory is that the annual allotment made to each State is sufficient to supply whatever equipment the Government will allot to the National Guard of such State.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. I desire to ask whether the apportionment to each State is not in relation to the efficiency of the National Guard in that State.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe it is based largely on numbers and the records of attendance at drills.

Mr. BATHRICK. In other words, efficiency—in other words, the purpose of the Government was to encourage efficiency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no question about that.

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, if the annual appropriation under present circumstances is granted next year, will not the efficiency of the National Guard in the State of Ohio be depleted by just the amount of the loss of this equipment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One thing has been lost sight of in the discussion of this question, both by those representing the National Guard and by gentlemen representing Ohio itself, and that is the utter absence of any information as to just how much the State of Ohio appropriates for the National Guard. My recollection is that the State appropriated $250,000 only toward the flood condition, and the other moneys which were obtained were obtained either by direct appropriation from the Federal Treasury or by the generosity of the people of the United States. It seems to me a great State like Ohio should not come here as supplicants.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this equipment which is furnished by the General Government to the National Guard in the different States is for the benefit of the State or for the benefit of the common people and the General Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman and I agree as to the purpose for which it is furnished. It is to encourage the training of civilians for military service in case of necessity.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman would not contend it is made as an act of charity. The General Government makes the general appropriation because it believes it is for the benefit of the General Government and the people. If that be the case—

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not always the theory upon which the Government appropriates money.

Mr. MANN. That may not always be the fact; of course that is the theory. If that be the theory and the fact, what is the distinction in this case between replacing the equipment which the General Government has furnished for its own good, which has been destroyed, and replacing a building which the General Government owns in a town and which is burned up?

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble with the position of the gentleman from Illinois is that he assumes that the Federal Government is going not simply to aid but support the National Guard. Now, the reason that we do not support the National Guard and only aid it is on the theory that the State should do something. The loss here was a loss by the militia in performing work for the State and the building illustration is not a pat illustration. There the Government has a Federal building, used by the Federal Government and furnished in its entirety by the Federal Government.

Mr. MANN. But used for the benefit of the local people.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be; but it is for an entire Federal purpose. There is a distinction running all through this Government between Federal and State provinces, and that is the point in this matter, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] well states. Suppose a fire occurs in an armory. Suppose in the city of Louisville at this moment a fire should come and destroy the handsome armory which we have there for our National Guard, and with it the equipment of the National Guard.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman would be here with a bill to-morrow.

Mr. SHERLEY. I might; yes. I might have a bill, following the same local pressure which is exerted upon all of us. I have no criticism of Ohio Members, but simply because they have a local pressure is no reason why the House as a whole should necessarily yield to that pressure.

Mr. MANN. After all, what is the distinction between where the General Government furnishes an equipment, not for the benefit of the State, not as a matter of charity, but for the benefit of the General Government, and that is destroyed, and where the Government sends the Army and the Life-Saving Service into this flooded district and its property was destroyed and it replaces that?

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason is simply this: Because in the one instance the instrumentality that is destroyed is entirely a Federal one, and in the other one it was primarily a State one with Federal aid.

Mr. MANN. Is not the equipment directly a Federal equipment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but it is given to a State agency.

Mr. MANN. Well, all we replace is the equipment.

Mr. SHERLEY. But on that theory whenever the State used up its equipment for any sort of purpose—through neglect or anything else—then, because we want to always see that it is equipped, we should replace it.

Mr. MANN. Suppose in the course of time this equipment is worn out and destroyed. Does anyone suppose the State government—

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is replaced each year out of its allotment.

Mr. MANN. The Government will never be called upon to replace it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. I have explained that. The State should replenish it out of its annual allotment and out of its annual appropriation. In this flood the State of Illinois used its National Guard and the State of Nebraska used its National Guard, and the State of Nebraska used its National Guard in the disaster at Omaha. They saw service. The men subjected their equipment to service and to wear. They have not come here asking for additional allotment. I have no doubt that the amount marked off properly each year for the National Guard of Ohio equals $78,000, because they receive $166,000 of equipment each year from the National Government. The only question involved here is whether, when the equipment is used up, lost, or destroyed and the State relieved from liability for that equipment, Congress will make additional appropriation to that State to the allotment to which it is entitled under the law. That is the sole question.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman inform us whether the militia was ordered out in this instance by the governor of the State or by the War Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The War Department can not order out the National Guard of Ohio or the National Guard of any other State. It was ordered out by the governor of Ohio.

Mr. MOORE. Then does not that leave us in this position, that we are asked to reimburse the State of Ohio for equipment allotted to it by the Government which was used under the instructions of the governor and was not used under the instructions of the War Department at all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, we might just as well have been asked to replace the equipment that was worn, or used, or made worthless, by the calling out of the National Guard of Ohio in the strike at Columbus within recent times.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. After all, is not this the same question we had when we passed the first bill, of how much money we are willing to appropriate for the National Guard, and have we not as much right to make this appropriation as we had to make the original one, and is it not on the same ground?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question is as to the wisdom of Congress making the original allotment.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has propounded a question two or three times, or rather made the statement, implying that there is some analogy between the destruction of property as the result of a strike or mobs in a State and the destruction of property by the act of God. Now, will the gentleman answer this question? Does he think that the State should be held equally responsible at its own peril to protect the property of its citizens by the exercise of its police power against mobs or against trouble through strikes and to protect property against floods or earthquakes? The State must protect property against violence by mobs as must also the municipality, or if negligent in furnishing such protection, must respond in damages. But the municipality is not responsible if a cyclone blows a man's property to destruction. The municipality or a State ought not to be held—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin misunderstood what I said.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman said we might as well ask the United States to replace property destroyed as the result of a strike as to claim that we ought to replace these arms and other equipment destroyed by that flood.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman misunderstood what I said.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman asked that question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said you might just as well ask the United States to replace the equipment of the National Guard that was worn out or used up or rendered useless because of service resulting from the calling out of the troops at the time of a strike or some other emergency or other service in the field.

If it were not for the fact that this equipment was lost because of the service of the National Guard during this flood, creating conditions which have appealed to the sympathies of everybody, no one would ever suggest that an additional allotment should be made to the State of Ohio. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that everyone understands this question so thoroughly that we may now vote upon it. I ask for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] to recede from the disagreement on the part of the House to the Senate amendment numbered 44 and to concur in the same.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 19.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report amendment numbered 61.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 61, page 36 of the printed bill: Strike out the following: "The five additional circuit judgeships provided for by the act of Congress approved June 18, 1910, and by chapter 9 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, are hereby abolished, and the authority in said acts of Congress for the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint five additional circuit judges is hereby repealed, and the number of circuit judges is hereby reduced to 29. So much of the acts of June 18, 1910, and of March 3, 1911, as authorize or direct the said five judges to preside in the circuit or district courts of the United States or in the circuit courts of appeals or to exercise any of the powers, duties, or authority of circuit or district judges, or of said circuit or district courts or of said circuit courts of appeals, is hereby repealed"; and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the tenure of any of the judges now acting as circuit judges by appointment under the terms of said act, but such judges shall continue to act under assignment, as in the said act provided, as judges of the district courts and circuit courts of appeals; and in the event of and on the death, resignation, or removal from office of any of such judges, his office is hereby abolished and no successor to him shall be appointed."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur therein.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 61 and concur therein.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask if it is possible in any way to have separate consideration of amendment numbered 54, on page 32?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has already been agreed to in the conference report. That is not now before the House.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It is not possible to have a vote on that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

The SPEAKER. There is a rule about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the Senate amendment is to strike out of the provision in the bill abolishing the Court of Commerce as it passed the House—the provision that abolishes the five additional circuit judges provided in the act creating the Commerce Court—and insert a provision to the effect that the judges appointed under that act shall continue in office until they cease to be circuit court judges, either by death, resignation, or removal from office. As each one of these offices becomes vacant it is abolished and provision is made that no successor can be appointed for these judges.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would like to ask what disposition has been made of amendments Nos. 59 and 60?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will answer the gentleman's question after we have disposed of this amendment. We have now before us amendment No. 61, which I wish to discuss.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would like to know how you jumped over No. 59?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. The House receded from its disagreement to that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Those amendments were concurred in, and they are not now before the House. The conference report has been adopted.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a difference of opinion among lawyers as to the power of Congress to abolish these five additional circuit judges. I am so interested in having the Court of Commerce abolished that I have never been so particular about the abolition of the five judges created by the act establishing the Court of Commerce.

I am inclined to think, from information that has come to me, that there are some men in another body who are so firmly convinced that Congress has not the power to abolish these judgeships that they will resort to every expedient to prevent the passage of this bill if an attempt be made to pass it carrying the provision abolishing the judges, and anxious as I am to have the Court of Commerce abolished, believing that its abolition is highly desirable, I prefer to agree to the proposition of the Senate that these men be permitted to continue in their offices and as these various offices become vacant they be abolished, in order to accomplish the more important matter, the abolition of the court.

Now I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is known to the House and shown by the RECORD that the provisions of the bill as it left the House, which are now stricken out by the amendment of the Senate and which we are now considering under the proposition of the gentleman from New York to recede and concur, was enacted by the House by a vote of 171 to 78, and is in the identical words and terms and phrases of the amendment placed upon the executive, judicial, and legislative bill last year by the Senate, and which passed the Senate but was disposed of in conference. The Senate, now that the House adopted the amendment which the Senate adopted last year, strikes that amendment out and submits another amendment which continues the judges beyond the term of office for which this court was established.

Now, the gentleman from New York says he understands that there is in another body certain gentlemen who, if this amendment is not agreed to, will not permit this bill to pass; who, by reason of their opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the action we have taken, will not submit to it. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, and I have read the debates on the question in the Senate, that the gentlemen to whom the gentleman from New York refers are guided so much by what they deem to be the unconstitutionality of this bill as they are by other reasons not founded upon the Constitution; because they say that while they are doubtful about the constitutionality of it they object to the policy of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill. The House by a vote I have stated passed this provision. I do not believe that we ought simply to abolish this useless court, but we also ought to abolish and get rid of the useless and unnecessary judges that go with the court. [Applause.]

We are sometimes, Mr. Speaker, fearful of increasing the Army. I have less fear of increasing the American Army from the body of the citizens of the United States than I have of increasing an army of judges. I have no doubt myself—I have never had any doubt myself—as to the absolute constitutionality of the action of this House. I do not conceive how under a Government founded like ours, with limited powers, with the authority granted as to what they may do, and when the power is given to Congress to establish such inferior courts as it may from time to time determine upon, ordain, and establish—I use the exact language of the Constitution—that the stream can rise higher than the source, that the creature can ever become greater than the creator. If we shall consider that to be a legal truism, that Congress can not take away from a judge hereafter created the office, and thereby deprive the judge of the office, we ought to be very careful, indeed, how we hereafter create any judicial office. If it means a judge for life, if it means that you can not abolish his office, no matter how we may desire to change our judicial system, then, so far as I am concerned, as long as I remain in Congress and can exercise any influence upon the legislative body we will never create another judge or another judicial circuit, because if we are in this anomalous position which the framers of the Constitution never conceived could exist, that the creature could rise greater than the creator, that Congress loses its power to destroy when it creates, we ought to see to it that no more judges are created.

I have in my hand the debates in the Senate, and I have read the debates in the House, upon an occasion in 1802 when Congress not only repealed an act creating the judicial system enacted in 1801 under President Adams, but it repealed the law and took away from 16 circuit court judges their office, abolishing the office of judge, and the judges from that day to the time they died never applied to Congress to pay their salaries, and their salaries were never paid, and no effort was ever made in Congress to pay the salaries on the ground that the act was unconstitutional or that when Congress abolished the office the judge could still continue in office. Is it not a singular fact that these 16 circuit court judges in the time of President Adams, who qualified and held court for a year, when the court was abolished by a vote of 16 to 14 in the Senate and 61 to 34 in the House, who had their salaries taken away from them, is it not singular that none of these judges who lived long lives afterwards ever claimed that they had the right to receive their salaries?

I apprehend that men who were of sufficient ability to go upon the bench as judges, to be appointed by President Adams, if they and their friends believed then that it was unconstitutional to repeal the act creating the circuit judges and take away the office and salary, would have taken some steps and that we would have heard something of it in the courts or in Congress. Yet, I undertake to say—and it is even stated by gentlemen who advocate this amendment—that nowhere does it appear that these judges ever sought to enforce their right to a salary which it is now claimed these judges would have if we unconstitutionally, as they claim, abolish this court.

Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty in this matter. I believe the establishment of that court was a mistake. I voted against it when it was established. I made a minority report, with two of my Democratic colleagues on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, against its establishment. We failed to keep it out of the bill upon the floor of the House by a tie vote. Either a baseball game or some other amusement took away from the floor some of our Members when they ought to have been here.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that this provision stricken out by the Senate amendment was the result of careful consideration on the part of the House?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have already stated that it was the same identical amendment that was carefully considered and prepared by the Senate at the last session and passed by the Senate and sent to the House, and carefully considered at this session and passed by a vote of 171 to 78.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. And if we withdraw from our position at this time it is simply saying that we will allow the opinion of those at the other end of the Capitol to sway our judgment here?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to say that. I will say this, that if it endangers the bill to the effect that they say it does it might be wise to recede. If the House shall vote to recede, I desire to say that I do not recede one iota from the conviction that I had when I offered the provision on the floor of the House and was successful in having it put upon the bill, because it was voted down in the Committee on Appropriations and I reserved the right to bring it up on the floor of the House, and after the House had considered it, by a vote of 2 to 1 the amendment was adopted. It is for the House to say whether it shall recede.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did I understand my colleague correctly to say a moment ago that about a year ago the Senate agreed to this very thing?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not only agreed to it, but the Senate placed it on the legislative bill by its own action.

Mr. HARDWICK. And that as soon as we agree to it now the Senate takes back what it originally did. Is that the situation?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the situation, with the exception that there are some new Senators in the Senate now who were not there when the Senate acted on this before.

Mr. HARDWICK. Was there a full vote in the Senate, a quorum present, when the Senate put in that provision?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; but there was not a full vote when the Senate disagreed to the provision that the House put in, and as I gather the parliamentary situation from reading the RECORD, it was such that the men in control of the bill were compelled to accept it or lose consideration of the bill, because there was no quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. So that a minority of the Senate is enforcing its views on the House?

Mr. BARTLETT. A majority of the Senate, when it can be obtained, will favor the House provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that is the correct situation, I do not know but that we ought to force the Senate to have a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not understand the situation. Our conferees move now to recede?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. FITZGERALD, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and one of the conferees, is moving to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. And the effect of the Senate amendment is to abolish the court, but to retain the judges?

Mr. BARTLETT. To retain the judges as long as they shall live or not resign or be removed, and each place is abolished as it becomes vacant.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is there another motion pending?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the only motion pending. Now, Mr. Speaker, are we always to be bound by the follies of a law that ought never to have been passed? I hope not, for there is only one constitutional court—created by the Constitution—namely, the Supreme Court. This Congress can not abolish; that right is left with the people to abolish or change by constitutional amendment; and it can hardly be denied that if the people should abolish the Supreme Court by constitutional amendment they could at the same time provide for a different tenure of office for the new judges and take away the office from the present Justices of the Supreme Court.

The inferior courts and the judges of such courts are just as subject to the control of Congress as the judges of the Supreme Court are to that of the people.

No stream can rise higher than its source. No office created by the legislative branch can be greater than the creator.

With full power vested in the Congress to from time to time establish such inferior courts as it may deem proper, surely the makers of the Constitution did not intend to say that when Congress created an office of judge to preside and the court it thereby created something which was beyond its power to remove.

If such were the case, we would be in fact as well as in theory a judge-ruled people; and while we might destroy the instrument through or by which the judge tyrants might injure the people still they would remain in office—in office that no longer existed—and be foisted on the people to be supported from the Public Treasury. Such a view is so abhorrent to every view of construction, and so destructive of the right of the people to control their own affairs as they had provided by the Constitution, that I can not entertain it for a moment. If anyone will read the debates had on the bill to repeal the judiciary act of 1801, by which 16 "midnight judges" were appointed by President Adams, and by the terms of which not only were the offices of these judges abolished, but the judges themselves removed, he will be convinced that Congress has this power now asserted. The votes in the Senate were cast mainly on partisan lines, being 16 for and 14 against. The vote in the House, whose Members had come directly and fresh from the people, was 60 to 34. And it is also true that while vigorous opposition was made both in the House and Senate against the passage of the bill on the ground that it was unconstitutional to take away from the judges their life tenure of the offices created by the act of 1801, yet 16 judges were deprived of their offices. They were removed, a new judiciary system was created, new judges were appointed to the newly created judgeships, and no appropriation was made for the salaries of the judges thus removed. Neither at that Congress nor at any subsequent Congress were the salaries of these judges thus removed ever paid, and no case was ever brought to test the validity of the act of Congress. Surely if the act was so clearly unconstitutional some one of the 16 judges would have endeavored to collect the salary which, according to those who contended for the unconstitutionality of the act, should be for the life of the judge.

The truth is the Constitution, when properly construed, makes the life of the inferior courts of the United States depend entirely upon the will of Congress, and the tenure of the judge can continue no longer than the existence of the office; for how can there be such an anomaly as that a judge should have his salary undiminished "during his continuance in office" when there was no "office" to continue in, because Congress had abolished the office? No one contends seriously that Congress can not abolish the office of the judge; the contention is that Congress can not remove the judge from the office or take away his salary for continuing in an office which no longer exists, which, to my conception of the Constitution, is almost an absurdity, a paradox in legislation. Congress is empowered by the Constitution, "from time to time, to establish inferior courts," and the judges shall hold their offices during good behavior; their salaries are not to be diminished during their continuance in office.

Mr. Speaker, after careful consideration; after much study both of the debates had when this bill was before the Senate last year, and the other night—when it was before the Senate then—after reading the words of those undertaking to write upon the Constitution and position of the Supreme Court upon what character of courts we have, I close with this statement: The Supreme Court is the only constitutional court created by the Constitution. It is the court of the people. The people can change it when they please in a constitutional manner by constitutional amendment. All other courts are courts of Congress. Congress has as much constitutional power to change a court created by it, taking away the office of the judges thus created, as the people have the right to change or abolish the office of the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner provided in the Constitution. Believing that to be true, I can not vote to recede from this amendment and will not. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the argument just made by the gentleman from Georgia is one of the most remarkable illustrations I have ever heard of the truth of the old saying that consistency is a rare jewel. Consistency is such a rare jewel that the gentleman from Georgia, who is generally a consistent defender of the Constitution, who prides himself, among other things, and very properly, on being a defender and upholder of the Constitution, in this case is attempting to argue that the Constitution does not mean what it says in the very plainest of language. The Constitution of the United States says that the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior. The gentleman from Georgia does not deny that statement and does not attempt to prove that the Constitution does not mean what it says, but he says that it should not be so, because, forsooth, the creature should not be greater than its creator. And he assumes in this statement that the Congress is the creator of these judges and therefore ought to have the power to undo what it has once done and place its creature, the judge, back in the position in which he originally was. The gentleman's argument is not sound. There are many cases in which creatures of legislative act are placed in positions from which they can not be removed by their creator. In other words, there are many things done that can not be undone legally. We, through due and proper processes of law, grant American citizenship to those who are qualified to receive that great boon. We have no more power, neither the Congress nor the courts, to take away from the naturalized citizen the boon of citizenship granted him than to take away from a judge that tenure which the Constitution grants him. Either can be taken away for the same reason, to wit, on account of misbehavior or commission of crime. But there is another fault in the gentleman's logic, there is another difficulty with the logic of the gentleman from Georgia. The Congress is not the creator of the judges of the superior or inferior courts in the sense that the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. All the authority they have granted them by the Constitution they receive under the Constitution.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman—

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will let me finish my sentence.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The only province of Congress in the matter is to act as the instrument under the Constitution for the creation of the office. The Constitution has decided what the tenure shall be after the judge is appointed.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to finish just one sentence.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no desire to interrupt you. I am sure the gentleman had finished more than one sentence.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say finish the statement, then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas). The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. The Constitution has fixed the tenure of Federal judges. The gentleman from Georgia and the other gentlemen on that side may not like it, but the Constitution is as clear in that regard as it is in any sentence or in any provision of that immortal document. There is nothing clearer than the words I have just referred to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to me that—

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] discussed the matter for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want any more time if the gentleman does not consider that gentlemen on this side are entitled to time.

Mr. CARLIN. I hope the gentleman will allow the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to finish his sentence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I supposed the Members wanted to get away.

Mr. MONDELL. This is the first five minutes, I will say to the gentleman, that I have taken in the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from Georgia is entirely faulty in his logic, then, in two particulars: First, in his proposition that the creator, as he sees fit to term it, is greater than the creature in the sense that it can always take from the creature a privilege or a right once granted. We all know that is not true. I used a moment ago as an illustration the granting of citizenship. The gentleman's logic is further lame, as I have suggested, in that these judges are not the creatures of Congress. They are creatures of the Constitution. We may not like that provision of the Constitution which says that if Congress creates judges, if Congress under the Constitution provides for judges, their tenure shall be during good behavior. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will be the last person on the floor to suggest that the Constitution is the creature of Congress, and that Congress has powers over and above the Constitution or that Congress has any right to fly in the face of the clear and explicit provisions of the Constitution.

But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is illogical in another way. There is no man on that side of the House who has more frequently expressed abhorrence of the doctrine of the recall of judges and the doctrine of the recall of judicial decisions than the gentleman from Georgia. And yet to-day we find the gentleman from Georgia lining himself up with those who believe in the recall of judicial decisions and with those who believe in the recall of judges.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman misstates my position. He can not state that I line myself up with those people. I have not heard a dozen people on this side say that they were in favor of the recall of judges or recall of decisions. I have never lined myself up with those people.

Mr. MONDELL. While constantly protesting, the gentleman takes a position not consistent with his protestation.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Is the gentleman in favor of the Senate amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I am.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, if the gentleman's position be correct, that this is a constitutional matter and not a matter for legislation, does he not admit that the Senate amendment is a useless thing?

Mr. MONDELL. A useless thing?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; of course. If the gentleman's position is that these judges hold a constitutional office and can not be legislated out of office, is it not useless, then, for the Senate to legislate and say that these judges shall retain their offices?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will not the gentleman from New York give me two minutes more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the intention of the language contained in the bill was to legislate these men out of office. Now, I admit that it might be possible for these judges in some way or other to bring that question before the courts.

Mr. CARLIN. That Senate amendment expressly provides that those judges shall retain their offices. If the gentleman's position is correct, Congress has nothing to do with it, and therefore the amendment is a useless thing.

Mr. MONDELL. I presume that the gentleman from Virginia has read the amendment. Has he?

Mr. CARLIN. I have.

Mr. MONDELL. The Senate amendment strikes out the provision in the bill as it passed the House, which attempted to legislate these judges out of office. That language was stricken out, and I imagined that nothing more would be necessary; but the Senate saw fit to add some other provisions, and, to say the least, they are not objectionable from the standpoint of those who do not believe that Congress has the power to legislate these judges out of office.

Mr. CARLIN. But is it not in effect a senatorial expression of the contention that the Congress has the power to legislate in the matter?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not think that is so. Anybody who will read the constitutional provision can make up his mind on that subject in a moment.

Mr. CARLIN. Why, then, the necessity on the part of the Senate to legislate to retain those judges if legislation was not necessary?

Mr. MONDELL. The House attempted to legislate these judges out of office. The Senate amendment assures us that that attempt shall not be successful.

Mr. CARLIN. And that they shall be retained in office?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; that they shall be retained in office.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, a question of considerable difficulty and of undoubted interest is presented in this connection by the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. In support of this motion it is argued that when a court is directly abolished by a statute of the United States, or when there is such a rearrangement of districts as in effect abolishes the district to which any particular judge belongs the Congress has the power thereafter, or in that connection to abolish that judge, and terminate his tenure.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that in this debate we have lost sight of the substantial difference between the court that is created, and the judge that is assigned to hold that court. Undoubtedly we can create a court, and in that connection we enjoy the power to abolish the same; but we do not elect the judge of that court, and a very different situation is presented when it is contended that a judge once appointed pursuant to the Constitution can be abolished after the same fashion that we abolish a statutory court, or that his tenure is terminated merely because some court over which he presides is swept away by statutory enactment. The judge has a tenure fixed by the Constitution, and not related to the court over which he presides, or to which he may happen to be assigned. Congress may afford him, a court, or take it away at pleasure, but the determination of his jurisdiction does not thereby determine his tenure.

If we look to the act by which this court was established, we find that Congress created a Court of Commerce, and provided that the judges to hold that court should be circuit judges of the United States. It was further provided that five additional circuit judges should be appointed. In due course these judges have been appointed.

As soon as that court was brought into existence, and the creation of these judges provided for, then another functionary under the Constitution of the United States was empowered to make these appointments. This functionary was the President of the United States, and by virtue of the power vested in him by the Constitution he proceeded to appoint the five additional circuit judges provided for by the act creating the Commerce Court.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I make the suggestion to the gentleman that when he says the President came into action in making these appointments of circuit judges the Senate likewise had some connection with it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, the action of the President was by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Constitution of the United States, after saying where the judicial power shall be vested, proceeds to say that the judges of the Supreme Court, and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behavior. Mr. Speaker, having in mind the declarations of the Constitution in this respect, fixing as they do the tenure of the judges appointed by the President, and having further in mind the essential difference between the creation of a court, or the establishment of a district, or circuit, it does seem to me that our power to take the step suggested by this motion is, to say the least of it, highly questionable. This question has been mooted in my State, but it has never been held under circumstances parallel to, or analogous to this situation that we could destroy a judge by abolishing his district during his term. Mr. Speaker, in view of these considerations, I insist that we should not embark upon the highly doubtful policy that is presented in this motion of the gentleman from Georgia, or seek to essay the destruction of these judges who have been duly appointed under the authority of law.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, if I have time.

Mr. LOGUE. I think the gentleman has time. In the creation of the new additional five circuit judges were those five judges appointed specifically and definitely to the Commerce Court?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will read from the act which established the court:

The Commerce Court shall be a court of record and shall have a seal of such form and style as the court may prescribe. Said court shall be composed of five judges, to be from time to time designated and assigned thereto by the Chief Justice of the United States, from among the circuit judges of the United States, for the period of five years, except that in the first instance the court shall be composed of the five additional circuit judges to be appointed as hereinafter provided.

And so forth.

Mr. LOGUE. In their original appointment they are given the same powers as other circuit-court judges of the United States?

Mr. SAUNDERS. They are simply appointed as circuit judges.

Mr. LOGUE. And become a part of the new judicial system?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, the same old system, but with an enlarged number of judges in that system.

We have abolished the Commerce Court, thereby circumscribing but not terminating the area in which these additional circuit judges may be assigned for duty. The case is not so strong as it would be if the judges had been appointed exclusively for the Commerce Court. With the fall of the Commerce Court, the judges now serving therein, remain as circuit judges, and it is expressly provided by the act that the additional circuit judges provided for therein shall hold office during good behavior (this provision was superfluous), and from time to time be designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States, for service in the circuit court of any district, or the circuit court of appeals. Hence even with the abolition of the Commerce Court, the judges thereof have a large body of duties to which they may be assigned, and which they are competent to discharge. The argument that the creator is greater than the thing created, is sound, but it has no application here. A judge of the United States is no official created and elected by Congress. We set in motion the machinery which leads to his selection, but when we have performed our constitutional functions in this regard, namely, created a court which it is competent for us to erect, our activities cease, and certain other officials come to the front of the stage. The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, makes an appointment, thereby calling into existence a new official, and the moment that he comes into being the Constitution of the United States provides that his tenure shall be during good behavior. I submit that until they are impeached it is not competent for congressional action to determine the tenure of these judges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I have not risen for the purpose of discussing the constitutionality of this provision. We might as well, as far as arriving at a definite result is concerned, discuss the modes of baptism; we could deal with one about as quickly as with the other. But I want to print in the RECORD some suggestions that I intended to submit to the conferees with reference to the other Senate amendments. I had them ready and intended to hand them to the conferees, but I did not dream that the conferees would get along as rapidly as they did, for which I commend them.

I know it is now too late to have these suggestions considered by the conferees or by the House, as the report has been agreed to; but I think I ought to place them in the RECORD as expressing my own views and opinions on the Senate amendments to which they relate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In respect to the amendment on injunctions, the Senate amendment was agreed to by the managers on the part of the House, and this morning I had a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission requesting and urging that such action be taken.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to print these memoranda as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say in reference to the present injunction amendment that it mainly is the present law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The remarks of Mr. SIMS, above referred to, are as follows:

(H. R. 7898.)

"Memoranda pertaining to the above-numbered act as it passed the Senate.

"The language of the act as it passed the House, so far as it relates to the issuance of preliminary injunctions, restraining orders, and stay orders in Interstate Commerce Commission cases, contained in lines 15 to 25, inclusive, on page 38, and lines 1 to 21, inclusive, on page 39, should be restored, and the amendments inserted by the Senate in lieu thereof contained in lines 21 to 25, inclusive, on page 39, in lines 1 to 25, inclusive, on page 40, and in lines 1 to 17, inclusive, on page 41, should be stricken out.

"Prior to the passage of the Commerce Court act of June 18, 1910, no distinction was made between a preliminary injunction on the one hand and a restraining or stay order on the other hand, and it is difficult to see why any such distinction should be made now. A restraining order or a stay order would interfere with the work of the commission in the same way and to the same extent as would a preliminary injunction. It is true that the act limits to 60 days the time the stay order is to remain in force, but it is also provided that the same judges who issue the stay order may afterwards continue it in force by making an additional order.

"The stay-order provision appears to have been prompted by the belief that orders of the commission should not be permitted to become effective until after the carriers against whom they are directed have had an opportunity to prove that they are invalid and have failed to do so, provided the carriers are able to show that irreparable injury to them will result if the orders are put in force and finally held to be invalid; and such a showing the carriers could of course make in every case. It is apparent that if, by reason of an order of the commission, a carrier is compelled to accept 10 cents for a service which would otherwise yield 12 cents it will, so long as the order is in force, lose the difference of 2 cents, and that such difference can not thereafter be recovered by the carrier if the order is finally held to be invalid. In other words, it is true, generally speaking, that where a carrier is compelled to obey an order of the commission it will be thereby irreparably injured if, upon final hearing in court, the order is held to be invalid; but the reverse of this proposition is also true. If enforcement of a valid order is suspended, the party in favor of whom the order is made will be irreparably damaged thereby. It is said that such damage may be offset by an order of reparation, but while this may be all right theoretically it is not correct as a practical matter. Damages caused by demoralization of a shipper's business, which results from unreasonable rates or undue discriminations, can not be definitely measured or described, and, as a consequence, can not be offset by an award of reparation. It is therefore evident that there will be risk of irreparable injury regardless of whether the order of the commission is allowed to become effective in accordance with its terms, and under these circumstances it is also plain that a court should not prevent an order of the commission from taking effect unless it entertains grave doubt from the evidence submitted concerning the validity of the order. Up to the time the commission decides the case the shipper has to take the risk of irreparable injury, and after that time and until hearing and determination by the court it does not seem unfair to require the carriers to assume a similar risk.

"The act as it passed the Senate provides for the issuing of a stay order upon three days' notice, and in some instances this would not enable an attorney to go from Washington so as to be present at the hearing. The commission must give the carrier at least 30 days' notice before the order can become effective, and it would seem as though the carrier ought to be required to give at least five days' notice of hearing on motion for a preliminary injunction, restraining order, or stay order. In this connection, the provision of the Hepburn Act was as follows:

"That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission.

"Under the laws heretofore enacted a carrier has never been given a right to appeal from a decree of the court refusing a preliminary injunction, but in the act here in question, as it passed the Senate, such right is conferred. This provision will enable parties who so desire to increase the litigation connected with an order of the commission and cause more delay in reaching a final result than would otherwise be possible.

"The words 'in equity cases,' contained in line 5, on page 42, should be stricken out, and the words 'from the Commerce Court' should be inserted in lieu thereof.

"The words 'in equity cases' are new to the act to regulate commerce and might afford opportunity for differences of opinion concerning the procedure in taking an appeal to the Supreme Court; also, the amendment above suggested would be in the interest of harmony, as will be seen by examining lines 12 to 15, inclusive, on page 38 of the act.

"The words 'in case such transportation relates to a through shipment the term "destination" shall be construed as meaning final destination of such shipment,' contained in lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 38, in the venue paragraph, as it passed the Senate, appear to be surplusage and should therefore be stricken out.

"The words 'and in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case and upon the attorney general of the State,' contained in lines 5, 6, and 7, on page 42, because of an amendment made in the Senate, appear to be surplusage and should therefore be stricken out."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say a word on this item. During the entire discussion of this bill I have not said a word, because I did not want to delay the passage of the bill; but I believe it perfectly clear under the Constitution that the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is erroneous. The article which provides for the creation of the judiciary, without reading the whole article, reading only that portion which affects the tenure in office, is as follows:

Judges, both of the superior and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The Supreme Court of the United States is the only one of these courts that is created by the Constitution. The power to create carries with it the power to destroy, and when the Congress shall see fit and proper to abolish an office, with the office goes the salary. You will find in the various States of the Union where there are constitutional provisions just like this not a single court that has ever held that when you abolish the office that the salary does not go with it, but as long as the office is in existence you can not reduce the compensation of the officer so holding and performing the duties of that office.

This is the distinction. I concur heartily with the conclusion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that this Congress has the power to abolish the judges along with the abolishment of the court.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have we abolished the court?

Mr. Sisson. Absolutely.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are not these judges of the United States Circuit Court, and have you abolished the United States Circuit Court?

Mr. Sisson. Indeed, sir, you might not abolish the entire circuit court system, but you could abolish one of the circuits. You could abolish the office of one of the judges. If you have more judges than you need you can abolish the office of judge, and with the abolishment of the office would go the salary. I have no patience with that sentiment that when you find you have more judges than you need you can not abolish the office, and with the abolishment of the office carry the salary also.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Senate amendment abolishes the office upon the death or resignation of either of these gentlemen.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have a right to do that under the Constitution.

Mr. Sisson. It is an absurd situation to say that when Congress shall have created an office, as it has a right to do under the Constitution, it can not also abolish the office, and if we abolish the office the salary goes with it; but just as long, under the Constitution, as the office is in existence, then you can not drive a man out of office by reducing his salary during his tenure of office, and thereby compel him to resign. The only method by which you could reduce the salary at all would be to abolish the office.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Sisson. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When we abolish the Commerce Court, does it not leave the judges still judges of the circuit court?

Mr. Sisson. Not if we specifically abolish the specific office of circuit judge.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Are they not subject to assignment like any other circuit judge?

Mr. Sisson. But there is a great deal of difference between a circuit judge and the office of a circuit judge.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is not any such thing known to the law except in the case of these five judges. We have judges of the circuit court.

Mr. Sisson. That is absolutely true, and when the President of the United States under the law assigns a particular Federal judge to a circuit, it does not mean that that circuit court is a court which has been created to such an extent that you can not abolish the office of the circuit judge after he has been assigned to a circuit. It is absurd to me to reach any such conclusion as that and therefore I have no patience with it, and for that reason and for that only have I opened my mouth about it, and in the subcommittee where this matter was thrashed out fully I agreed absolutely with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and he and I were thoroughly in accord with this idea.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I now ask my friend a question?

Mr. Sisson. The gentleman may.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Assignment to this circuit court is only part of the duties of circuit court judges of the United States?

Mr. Sisson. That is true by statute.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When you abolish the circuit courts are there not other duties to which you may assign those judges which you have not abolished, so you have not abolished the jurisdiction and function of these judges.

Mr. Sisson. There is a difference between the abolishment of the Commerce Court and the abolishment of the office of one of these judges. I do not believe Congress sits here bound and tied under this provision here because the very language says that the salary shall not be reduced during his continuance in office. It does not say during his term, it does not say during his life, but the language is as specific as it can be made. It is during his continuance in office, and when you abolish the office he can no longer continue there, and there is a great distinction between reducing the salary of a man in office and abolishing the office, and I do not believe there can or ever will be a court of law that will hold to the contrary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have five minutes if I can secure it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson]. He admits that Congress has no power to legislate a justice of the Supreme Court out of office—

Mr. Sisson. I will state to the gentleman I made a distinction between offices created by the Constitution and those offices created by Congress.

Mr. COOPER. But I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the clause of the Constitution which retains the judges of the Supreme Court in office during good behavior is exactly one and the same clause that retains the judges of the inferior courts in office during good behavior. The clause is as follows:

The judges both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior.

Suppose that we make that clause into two sentences. One sentence would be, "The judges of the Supreme Court shall hold their offices during good behavior." The other sentence would be, "The judges of the inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." Why should you construe one sentence differently from the other, the phraseology being exactly the same?

The reasoning applicable here is the reasoning of the Supreme Court in discussing the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, which confers upon the Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and with the Indian tribes. The court in construing that provision has called attention more than once to the fact that the power over foreign commerce, interstate commerce, and with the Indian tribes is given in the same clause and in the same words without qualification, and has therefore held that it was the same power over each.

Now, here is a prohibition against legislating out of office the judges of the Supreme Court in exactly the same words and in the same clause with the inhibition against legislating out of office the judges of the inferior courts. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but in establishing this Commerce Court Congress, by law, in express terms declared that these judges should be circuit judges; and the Constitution expressly provides that "the judges both of the Supreme Court and of the inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior."

This being so, they can not be deprived of their offices except by impeachment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 61 and concur in the same.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let us have a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I have a minute, by unanymous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I acquiesce in this vote, but I do not recede from my position as to the importance of this bill. The other provisions of the bill constrain me to accept the vote as it is without further action.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report Senate amendment No. 82.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

"For investigating and reporting to Congress a suitable design for a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from the city of Washington to a point at or near the Arlington estate in the State of Virginia by the commission authorized pursuant to section 23 of the public buildings act approved March 4, 1913, $25,000, to be disbursed one-half by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on vouchers approved by the member of the commission designated by it to consider and approve vouchers for its expenditures."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur therein.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to this amendment and concur therein.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What act of March 4, 1913, is that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The public-building act, which creates the commission, consisting of the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House, and the chairmen of the Public Buildings Committees of the Senate and the House, for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the plans for a memorial bridge across the Potomac. It authorizes the expenditure of $25,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not involved in any way with the Lincoln Memorial?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. This commission has submitted an estimate for this money.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield me two or three minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but I wish to make a statement first. The question has been before Congress for a great many years, and numerous plans have been prepared and are in existence. It seems to me that since this commission is organized and may possibly require the money, so far as I am concerned, in view of the complexion of the commission, I can do nothing else than invite the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce 16 years ago. There was pending before that committee at that time a proposition to construct a memorial bridge under some name or other across the Potomac River at a very large expense. I was opposed to it, as were other members of the committee, and I think there has never been a session of Congress since that time when the same proposition was not pending before that committee which happens to have jurisdiction over the subject. I was always opposed to the proposition, but last year, when we had the Lincoln Memorial proposition up in the House—and the opposition to it had us defeated here for several months—I finally became an enthusiastic advocate of the memorial bridge across the Potomac River to connect the Lincoln Memorial on this side of the Potomac with Arlington on the other side of the Potomac and, as I hope, in the future to connect still further with Mount Vernon and Richmond, Va. [Applause.] I made the statement at that time in the House, and I feel obligated at all times to support these propositions following along the lines I mentioned then. I think, with the Lincoln Memorial, as it will be, a creation of beauty and affectionate regard, standing over here and connecting with the land on the other side, which was in the Confederate Government, and with roads and monuments which connect the city of Washington with the city of Richmond, we will have shown to those who follow us many years from now that really, after all, we have forgiven if we have not forgotten. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, fully concurring in the very beautiful sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and recognizing that without question this amendment will pass, inasmuch as the chairman of the committee [Mr. FITZGERALD] has added his request for it, yet I regret very much that that will be the result.

I think we are proceeding at altogether too rapid a pace in expending the revenues derived from the people's money in this country. Only the other day an estimate was made upon the revenues that were expected to be realized from the operation of the new tariff bill, and the best showing that could be made left a very narrow margin of a few million dollars at the end of the first year. That is a tariff, mind you, that in one sense is largely experimental, in so far as the revenues to be received from it are concerned; and yet if this project is carried out it will involve, in my judgment, the expenditure of at least half—more likely the entire amount—of the surplus or balance that it is estimated will come from this tariff bill and other sources of revenue during the first year.

It seems to me, my colleagues, that it would be wiser for us not to take this step at this time. Let us give this great economic measure, this tariff bill of ours, a fair chance to determine whether or not it is the revenue producer that we expect it will be.

I am not surprised, however, at the insistence of those who are back of this particular measure. I saw it coming when there was a compromise last year in favor of the Lincoln Memorial, and I could see then that not a few of my colleagues who were in favor of this great bridge were won over with the subtle argument—and even stronger than that, the downright promise—that the next thing on the program would be the advocacy of the building of this great bridge, costing several millions of dollars, which would connect the Monument Grounds of the National Capital with the other side of the Potomac.

I have no feeling of sectionalism in my mind at all in opposition to this project. My position would be the same if it were proposed to construct a bridge to connect any northern points. But we are now preparing at this moment to put into inauguration a new system of highway building by cooperation between the Nation and the different States, and I want to say in advance that, next to the public building and river and harbor appropriations, that system of highway improvements will draw the largest revenues from our Treasury. If I had my choice to-day, personally, so far as I am concerned, of devoting the amount of four or five million dollars that that bridge will cost, which can not be of any particular practical benefit except in a sentimental way, to that project or to the extension of better highways, I would rather devote it to the latter project. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

One growing need, especially to those who are intrusted with the guidance of the affairs of the Government—the majority, to which I belong—is economy in administration, and it goes along hand in hand with efficiency; and I fear that we are striking a gait altogether too rapid even for the great revenues of this rich country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield me five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to vote for the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

I regret that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] takes a mere dollars-and-cents view of this proposition. He seems to fear that it means extravagance hereafter. The fact is that if the amendment should be enacted into law it would not bind Congress ever to spend one penny after the preliminary investigation and report for which it provides. I can vote for a proposition to-day that appeals to my better judgment without binding myself to vote for something else in the future that I may then deem unworthy of support.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. COOPER. I regret that I can not yield now. I have only five minutes.

I do not look at this as an extravagance, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary I look upon it as an investment that will pay to this Nation dividends not to be measured in dollars and cents.

It astonished me to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] say that the Lincoln Memorial bill, which became a law last winter, was passed as the result of a compromise and of an express promise that the next thing to follow would be the memorial bridge. As for myself, I advocated the building in this city a memorial to Lincoln on the banks of the Potomac, but I had no thought of any bribery or other improper influence of any sort in connection with that legislation. Not until the gentleman from Ohio spoke a few moments ago had I ever heard an intimation that there had been anything of the kind, and never until the gentleman's speech had I ever heard of the alleged promise as to the memorial bridge.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] to make that statement. If he did, it is incorrect. There was no compromise or agreement made or anything that led up to it.

Mr. COOPER. Precisely so. My vote was cast for that bill because I desired to see in this Capital City a memorial to Abraham Lincoln worthy of his glorious fame.

I wished this memorial to be after the design recommended by the Burnham commission and made a leading feature of that commission's great plan for the improvement and beautification of the city of Washington. That plan provides for the removal of the Botanic Garden and the conversion of the site into Union Square; for the making of an avenue, bordered by trees, straight from the Capitol to the Potomac, this avenue to contain two monuments, one the towering shaft to the memory of Washington, the father of the Republic, and the other a beautiful memorial to Lincoln, the man who saved it; and that from the memorial to Lincoln a great bridge shall span the river to Arlington, where sleep the Nation's dead.

In the last Congress and also in the present Congress I introduced a bill to provide for such a bridge. Other Members introduced similar bills for the same purpose. I suggested that it be called the Grant-Lee Bridge, or the Bridge of Peace.

Mr. Speaker, the whole conception of this avenue as proposed by the Burnham commission is magnificent. The Capitol, Washington, Lincoln, the memorial bridge, Arlington! No other avenue in all the world would be so beautiful nor mean so much to the friends of free government.

It is not extravagance to make reasonable efforts gradually to complete such a project.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in taking the floor is to emphatically deny that I used any such expression as "bribery" in this connection. There certainly was no intention to convey such a thought. I said there was a compromise. I said it advisedly. I was present at a meeting or a distinguished gathering of Congressmen in which that word "compromise" was used. There was a suggestion that if the Lincoln Memorial could be put through the memorial bridge would logically follow next. That is the literal truth.

Mr. Speaker, if I am to be criticized for advocating economy on the floor, I can stand that criticism. I was in favor of and voted for the appropriation when it was made for the Lincoln Memorial. My desire expressed in a bill introduced in the House for that purpose took the form of a vocational institution to commemorate the virtues and services of the great savior of the Republic. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I cheerfully fell in line after the defeat of what I thought a better memorial with the proposition for the monument, and I am glad they are going to build it. I still say, however, that I have a right and intend to exercise it, to express my opinion, although it may not be at all times popular, on the side of reason and prudence in the expenditure of the public revenues. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am entirely satisfied in my own mind that the name of Lincoln is being used upon this occasion to conjure up a lot of sentiment strictly for mercenary purposes. [Applause.] I am not only from the South, but Lincoln's birthplace is in my district, and I have as much reverence for his memory as has any other man. I think that one of the greatest disasters that ever befell the South was the death of Lincoln at the time it came. [Applause.] I will go as far as the next man to do reverence and honor to his memory, but I am not willing to vote millions of money—for this is but an advance for millions of money—to further a real estate project near the Potomac River. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman state where that project is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman's opportunities to know ought to be better than mine.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not know any such thing, and I want the gentleman to state if he knows.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I said that I was entirely satisfied with it, and I am. A man named Gude, who has served a great many times on condemnation juries in the District of Columbia during the last five years, was before the Committee on the District of Columbia but recently and practically admitted that this was a real estate project. This, I repeat, in my judgment is but a real estate project to conjure votes under the sacred name of Abraham Lincoln. This thing ought to be stopped, and it ought to be stopped right here; and I am glad to see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] join in an attempt to stop a raid on the Treasury in the interest of the real estate people of the District of Columbia and the surrounding communities.

You are building a two-million-dollar memorial to Abraham Lincoln on Potomac Park, near one end of where it is contemplated this bridge is to be, and that ought to suffice. One gentleman has just referred to Sixteenth Street. I had occasion not long ago to refer to that myself. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars was appropriated for a bridge there, and it cost $734,000 to condemn the land at this end of that bridge to get to it; and when you have spent millions of dollars to build this bridge, then I say that the expense of it is only barely begun. The people who are behind it will then want millions more to improve the surroundings. Look at this scheme to acquire the park between this building and the Union Station. That was represented as being nothing more or less than an endeavor to beautify the Capitol Grounds by making a park. But what is that? That is but a scheme of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to sell their million and a half dollars' worth of property between here and the Union Station. All these things, I say, when you ferret them out, have a mercenary scheme behind them; and this is no exception to the rule. Ninety-one years ago the people from Pennsylvania came to this body and asked that the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal be exempted from taxation because that would make a link of union between the North and the South. Of what benefit has it been to anybody except that that corporation escaped taxation. And who owns it now? The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad—all for the purpose of stifling and cutting off any other railroad from coming into the District of Columbia through the cut and the natural gap this side of Harper's Ferry. To-day they are escaping taxation, notwithstanding the fact that when it comes to extending the park from the Potomac across Massachusetts Avenue and over to the Zoo they have property to sell to the District of Columbia and the Federal Government which for 91 years has borne no tax. Mr. Speaker, I say that when you vote this $25,000 to start this scheme you let in the camel's nose, and millions of dollars will follow it, all for a false sentiment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been in favor of the building of a memorial bridge to unite the city of Washington and the soil of old Virginia ever since I have been in Congress. I remember during the very earliest days of my service here standing on the heights of the Potomac, the historic family residence of the Lees, now the God's acre of the Nation, and regretting that we did not have spanning the Potomac a great monument which by reason of its location, would, more than any other we could build, exemplify and typify a reunited country. The Potomac, more than any other natural boundary, marks the dividing line in that historic struggle, now happily but a memory. It was the waterway across which back and forth the contending forces made their way. A bridge across that stream between the Capital of the Nation and the State which contained the capital of the Confederacy, a memorial structure of monumental design would be an inspiration to every patriotic American. It would be the one thing of all others that to my mind would exhibit to the world in lines of grandeur and beauty the change that has come with the passing years, and the cementing bond of love and affection which now binds the Union, North and South. Of course it will cost some money, and gentlemen say that it is largely a matter of sentiment. Well, that is true to a certain extent, although this bridge will have its important practical uses; but as a matter of sentiment it would pay ten thousand times what it cost, and I hope we may provide for this small appropriation to start the work on plans, and that in the near future we will inaugurate the work of building this great memorial bridge which would typify the unity of our beloved country. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that any gentleman on this side of the House could be found to object to the motion made by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee at this time. Both gentlemen, in my judgment, are mistaken in the view that they take of this appropriation. In the first place, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP], while favoring the general plan, is opposed to it now upon the ground of extravagance, and yet the same gentleman voted this morning for $97,000 for the State of Ohio, or rather to be returned—in reality given—to that State; and while I have no complaint to make against the gentleman who voted for heavy pension bills, yet I do feel I have the right to call attention to the fact when he argues for economy.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARLIN. If it is not to be taken out of my time. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHARP. I merely want to say I hope the time never will come when as a Member of this House I shall refuse to vote for just pensions to the saviors of our country.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman may continue to do that with perfect consistency, but he ought not to rail out at the time he does it against extravagance when the country is now paying. I think, $180,000,000 for that purpose. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says that he sees a rat in the meal tub. That is a remarkable statement. My friends, long before the gentleman from Kentucky ever occupied a seat in this House this Congress appropriated $25,000 for plans and estimates for a bridge across this river, and it was expended and plans were drawn and no real estate scheme has ever developed by reason of that expenditure. It is true they will not answer now, and if it be a real estate grab it has lived longer than the gentleman's service in Congress. I do not believe that such a thing is in the mind of any man who supports this project. I hope the gentleman is correct in one of his statements, namely, that it is the beginning of an appropriation which means the construction of a bridge across that river. My friends, let me say to you to-day that the Potomac River is a barrier to traffic between the North and the South and it is now only bridged by one small bridge. Private concerns are not permitted, corporations are not allowed to construct bridges across that river, and the only person that can build that bridge is the Federal Government itself, and if it rested upon no stronger ground than the mere necessity for the bridge in order to promote intercourse between the North and the South that ground alone would be sufficient. But, my friends, there is an additional ground. Is sentiment dead in our land? I hope not. I have never conjured upon the name of Lincoln in order to aid this bridge. Though born and reared under southern skies, it was one of the great pleasures that I have exercised since I have been a Member of this House to vote for the Lincoln Memorial. I believe it was a tribute which was due him by the Nation and its representatives.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman two minutes additional.

Mr. CARLIN. And now when it is proposed to connect that memorial with the home of Lee on the other bank of the Potomac River, while I do not conjure with the name of Lincoln, but Lincoln himself, in my judgment, if he lived to-day, would vote for a bridge across that river if for no other purpose than to connect the two sections of the country by an artistic memorial emphasizing the fact that we have a united country.

Some gentlemen see a rat somewhere in every appropriation that is proposed in this House. I have no objection to real estate people living. They have as much right to live as anybody else. I have no doubt that somebody, somewhere, may be benefited by the construction of this bridge from the mere standpoint of real estate. But that is not the motive behind the structure, that does not impel me or any other gentleman on this floor to its support, and it ought not to have been used here in this debate.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is brought in as a bugaboo. In the name of conscience, what has the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to do with this bridge? It has not a pound of rail within a hundred miles, so far as I know, of where this bridge is to be constructed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement: This commission was created in the public-building act which passed Congress in the last session. The authority for this expenditure was contained in that act. I recall that when that bill was brought into the House I endeavored to have it considered in some other way than under suspension of the rules. I had very little assistance from gentlemen who now condemn the recommendation that the appropriation be made. The commission consists of the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and the same committee in the House. That commission has submitted an estimate, in accordance with law, requesting this appropriation. While I have no desire to encourage, and I do not advocate, extravagant appropriations, I have frequently pointed out that when these authorizations are made and the time comes there is nothing left for Congress but to appropriate the money.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to his colleague [Mr. GOULDEN]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. While I am in favor of the proposition, I would like to ask the gentleman how much money has been already expended for the plans, and why were not these plans appropriated for by Congress?

Mr. CARLIN. They were prepared years ago, and they are obsolete.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that there were plans, and plans, and more plans, of bridges, of every style and character and type, estimated to cost from $3,000,000 to $20,000,000. But this commission will undoubtedly require the services of technical and expert men to examine and report to them, and to advise them, so that they may intelligently recommend action by Congress. In view of the circumstances, I can not, in the performance of my duty, assume that the three chief officials of this Government, selected by the Democratic Party, will be guilty of unjustifiable extravagance in the expenditure of money authorized to be appropriated and put at their disposal to perform certain duties which the law devolves upon them. For that reason I urge the adoption of the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want just a minute or two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies. My objection to this project is that the State of Virginia and the District of Columbia will be the parties principally benefited. This scheme contemplates building a bridge that benefits this locality only, and taxing all the people of the balance of the United States for it. If the Federal Government, using the bridge, should be called upon to pay a certain portion of the expense of it, and the District of Columbia a certain portion, and the State of Virginia a certain portion, by reason of the fact that the Government is located here in Washington close to the bridge, then I should have no objection, because I do not want the Federal Government not to bear its pro rata share of expense where it is benefited. But I have no sort of sympathy with the idea of "conjuring" with sentimental ideas for the purpose of building the bridge, because that means great marble entrances, means great boulevards and approaches, and means the condemnation of a great deal of property at exorbitant prices.

I recall well the night when I surrendered on the fight as to the purchase of the ground between here—the Capitol—and the Union Station, and so will the gentleman from Illinois. Once they beat me by 3 votes, and then by 2 votes, and then by 1 vote, and then, I believe, by 6 votes once. I did not believe when they started they ought to purchase property between here and the Union Station, but with all my efforts they succeeded with just a few Democratic votes and a solid Republican vote.

Mr. MANN. I said then that the gentleman would thank God that we beat him. He is not yet ready to do so, but after we have beautified the spot he will.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] told me so one night. But let me tell the new Congress here this: I have learned there are few friends of the Public Treasury in Congress, as a rule, on either side of the House; when you come to conjure around the names of certain great men they all become cowards.

As Madame Roland stepped upon the guillotine and the ax was about to fall upon her devoted neck, she cried aloud, "O Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" And I say it is so with Lincoln and with Lee and Grant and with all the other great national heroes. How many extravagances are committed in your names, O great shades of the past! [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The proposition before the House is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to recede from the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment numbered 82 and concur in the same.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks for a division. Those in favor of the motion will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-five gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-seven gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 55 and the noes are 57. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-seven gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to recede from the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment numbered 82 and concur in the same will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The roll was called, and prior to the announcement of the result the following occurred:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is announced I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings under which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to vacate the order for the yeas and nays and the roll call under the order. Is there objection?

Mr. Sisson. Reserving the right to object, I want to know—

Mr. MANN. That leaves it so that you win.

Mr. CARLIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, that leaves the vote standing 57 against the motion to 55 in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 82.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 82.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York kindly yield me three or four minutes in which to say what I feel I ought to say?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the gentleman would wait until some other time.

Mr. COOPER. What amounted to a direct reflection upon my integrity was made here on the floor of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. How much time does he want?

Mr. COOPER. Three or four minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin three minutes.

Mr. COOPER. I am greatly obliged to my friend from New York.

Mr. Speaker, immediately after I concluded my remarks in support of the motion of the gentleman from New York to concur in the Senate amendment respecting a memorial bridge across the Potomac River the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] arose and said that back of the proposition for a bridge, and, of course, back of the proposed amendment, was a real estate scheme, or a real estate ring, or something of that sort. I observed approving smiles not only upon that side but upon this side of the aisle, although there was no evidence to support a statement which amounted to a severe reflection upon me and upon other Members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have never owned, I do not now own, even so much as the slightest interest in any real estate except in the State of Wisconsin.

I have no relative who owns any interest in any real estate in the District of Columbia or in the State of Virginia. I do not, to my knowledge, know any person who owns real estate within 10 miles of what would be the Virginia end of the proposed bridge, and this end of which would be in a national park. No one, man, woman, or child, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, citizen of this District or of the State of Virginia, that I now recall, has ever spoken to me concerning a memorial bridge nor concerning the bill which I introduced for such a bridge except three old ex-Confederate veterans, who did not look as though they owned any real estate, but who did me the honor to come to my hotel, introduce themselves to me, a perfect stranger, and say, "Mr. COOPER, as ex-Confederate veterans, we were glad to see you introduce a bill proposing to construct a memorial bridge across the Potomac and call it the Grant-Lee Bridge. We love the name of Lee."

Mr. Speaker, if there be any real estate speculation involved in this proposal for a memorial bridge, I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to acquit me of participation in it. He made the statement without qualification. He was challenged to produce his proof by my friend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN]. He did not produce it.

Mr. Speaker, it is a serious thing to rise on this floor, after a Member has honestly made a speech in favor of a measure in which he thoroughly believes, and impugn the motives of that Member, particularly when the imputation carries with it a reflection upon his personal honor. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendment 82.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 82 with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following: "That fourth-class postmasters shall not"—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. THOMAS. But the amendment has not yet been read.

Mr. MANN. Enough of it has been read to show that the amendment is not germane, and I make the point of order. The Chair can easily determine that anything relating to fourth-class postmasters is not germane to this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 82.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to report the next amendment.

"For purchase of an automobile, including driving, maintenance, and care of the same, for the use of the Vice President, for the fiscal year 1914, $7,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 93, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers another amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I object to its being reported.

The SPEAKER. The objection is not well taken until the Chair can find out what it is.

Mr. THOMAS. The Chair did not find out what my amendment was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair found out the gentleman's amendment was about fourth-class postmasters. The gentleman named the men too quickly in his motion. If he had put them in at the other end of the amendment he might have had it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate amendment No. 93 by striking out the language proposed in the Senate amendment and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"For the purchase of two automobiles, including the driving, maintenance, and care of same, one for the use of the Vice President and one for the use of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the fiscal year 1914, $14,000, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order, because the amendment is not germane to the amendment proposing an automobile for the Vice President of the United States and an amendment proposing an automobile for another officer of the Government is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman, as the gentleman would have full responsibility, in fairness to the House to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will not. I insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I will tell you that ruling came high, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to further insist on the disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 93.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes had it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 121, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the next amendment be reported.

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives and the employees on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building, borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of October, 1913, for extra services rendered during the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 97.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a preferential motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARDWICK moves to recede from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment 97 and to concur in said amendment with the following amendment: "Page 61, line 16, after the word 'thirteen' insert 'including the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and the House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk.'"

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would like the gentleman to make it. I do not think it is good.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia by adding to it the words which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding the following: "And clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners who have been placed upon the roll of employees of the House in accordance with existing law."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I also reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I would like the point of order to be settled first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] also reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I would rather the points of order be discussed and settled now.

Mr. MANN. I would rather have the points of order reserved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is not in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. For what reason?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because it proposes an amendment to the Senate amendment which is not germane. The Senate amendment proposes to pay an extra month's salary to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, and employees on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] proposes to include other employees who are not categorically referred to in the pending amendment, and it would make it not germane. The Capitol police are not on the same roll or any roll that brings them within the provisions of the Senate amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is not well taken. It would be the superfinement of parliamentary hairsplitting for the Chair to hold arbitrarily that when the Senate undertakes by amendment to provide compensation for certain employees of both Houses of Congress that the House has no right to provide for compensation for certain other employees of the two Houses of Congress. In other words, it would narrow and restrict and limit the power of the House by formal construction beyond endurance to say when the Senate has opened up the subject matter of compensation for the officers and agents and employees of the Congress that we can not deal with the general subject that the Senate deals with but simply with the specific objects that the Senate mentions.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when the Senate undertakes to say that we will increase the salary of certain employees of the two Houses of Congress, or of either House of Congress, it opens up the subject of salaries of all classes of employees of the two Houses of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Where would the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] set the limit?

Mr. HARDWICK. It would be, to give the Chair my opinion, within the limit of the general classes described in the Senate amendment, but not confined to the specifications of the Senate amendment. For instance, let me illustrate: Suppose it said in express language, "We will increase the salaries of the secretaries to Senators," then undoubtedly no one would contend the House would not have the right, because it was not germane, to say we could not include similar employees of the House. So, if the Senate undertakes to say, "We will deal with this subject relating to employees of the Senate, or of the House, or of the two Houses generally," it seems to me, by any fair construction of parliamentary law, we open up that general subject.

The two Houses could never meet in agreement if the parliamentary rule as to germaneness was so strictly construed as that on every proposition. Then we could do nothing except to agree to the precise proposition the Senate submits, and if the Senate submitted this one proposition, describing it in precise, specific, and exact language, then, according to the narrow idea the gentleman from New York now advances, we would have no option except to agree to precisely what the Senate suggests or disagree thereto.

I have not had the time to examine the precedents, and I did not do so, because I never anticipated such a point of order as this. I do not think such a point of order as this has ever been made against this sort of a proposition, although it is not a new question. But I believe that an examination of the precedents will not disclose a single instance in which any such narrow construction as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] seems to try to invoke was ever given in this matter of germaneness. It seems to me that when the Senate opens up this sort of a question they open up the broad question of all employees of the two Houses of Congress and of each House of Congress and of the two Houses of Congress generally.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that this Senate amendment deals with certain Federal employees, and the amendment which you offered deals with Federal employees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then the gentleman thinks that post-office employees would be included?

Mr. CARLIN. I am speaking now of similar classes. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a resolution of the House which was passed here, I think, at the last session, making the clerks to Members, in effect, Federal employees in this case, and requiring them to register, and at present the warrants on the Treasury are made out to them.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, Mr. Speaker, I only want to add another word, that if any such rule of parliamentary construction as that contended for by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] were to obtain in this body, it would be impossible for the two Houses of Congress to legislate, and we could do nothing but simply say we accept or reject a Senate proposition, without modification or amendment, except within the most narrow limitations.

Every one of us has common sense enough to know that that is not what we do here day after day. If the gentleman from New York, by technical parliamentary tactics, can succeed in keeping the House from going into this subject which the Senate amendment raises, hereafter when a Senate amendment comes up on any proposition this same ruling could be invoked to keep us down to exactly what the Senate amendment specifies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must show some authority to demonstrate that his amendment is in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman from New York will permit me to interrupt him, I think he ought to show some authority indicating that it is not in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that is not the rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is not any sense in that. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not required to have any sense. It is sustained by the rule. That is the advantage which the gentleman from New York has over the gentleman from Georgia.

This amendment refers to a specific class of employees, and the amendment, in order to be germane, must not only be related to them in a general sense, but must have such a particular relationship to make this germane to the principle of the amendment. The gentleman proposes to bring in an employee of the Government Printing Office. He claims that that is germane to an amendment giving a month's extra pay to the employees of the Senate and of the House.

The Capitol police are not upon the rolls of either the Senate or the House. They are appropriated for under a special and distinct head. If the gentleman's theory is correct, not only would the inclusion of these employees be in order, but of employees in the Library of Congress or in the Department of Justice or in any other department of the Government would be in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have finished, Mr. Speaker. It is so clear to me that this matter is not germane that I do not care to discuss it further.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to submit a question to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would it not be within the power of the conferees to agree upon exactly the same proposition as is made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do not conferees make compromises on germane subjects?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is done constantly in conference.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, since the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has yielded the floor, I want to say that the conferees between the House and the Senate upon germane subjects in almost every appropriation bill have arrived at compromises upon these subjects, and what the conferees can do the House can certainly do.

The SPEAKER. It is a good while since the limitations on the action of the conferees have been stated here, and there are a good many new Members now in the House. In June, 1812, Henry Clay laid down the limitations about the power of conferees. In brief, they were these: That a subject to be treated by the conferees must have been treated originally in the House bill, or in a bill that originates in the House, or in a Senate amendment to that bill, or in a House amendment to a Senate amendment. The conferees can not go outside of that, and if the class of officers which it is sought to bring under this rule was not dealt with either in the bill itself as it left the House or in a Senate amendment, then the conferees have no business with it. It shuts them out completely.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Speaker would not be sustained by the Speaker ordinarily, because he did not make it as broad as it should be or as he usually has made it. The Speaker has made a good many statements to the House at different times with reference to the power of conferees, and has made them exceedingly well; but the Speaker does not mean to say, I am sure, that the conferees can not insert any new matter in a Senate amendment. For instance—

The SPEAKER. They can perfect a Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. For instance, take the proposition now pending. The Senate amendment proposes to give an extra month's pay to officers and employees of the Senate and the House, so far as the House is concerned, borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st of October. What is the proposition? First, to pay to the officers and employees of the House an extra month's pay. That includes the official reporters of the House, and it includes all persons who are employees of the House. Thereupon a Senate amendment contains a limitation upon that and says that these officers and employees who are borne on the annual or session rolls. Now, certainly no one will contend that if we have a daily roll of the House we can not include the employees on the daily roll, although it would not be included because of the limitation in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment covers all employees of the House. To begin with, the limitation fixes the 1st of October on the annual and session rolls. Would anyone contend that we could not change the date from October 1 to October 10 or October 20 or November 1 if we chose to, although it might include somebody who had not been on the rolls October 1? That is where the Speaker made a narrow limitation, unintentionally, because we are not confined to the persons who would be covered by the Senate amendment. We may include other persons if we can do it by including another class within the scope covered by the Senate amendment.

Now, I do not undertake to say whether there is any item in the amendment subject to a point of order, for I have not examined it carefully. Certainly the House, with the Senate amendment before it, has the right to so enlarge it as to include other employees of the House or so diminish it as not to include all those named in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he contends that employees of the Government Printing Office could be put in under this amendment?

Mr. MANN. The Speaker, I suppose, has reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk.

The SPEAKER. Yes; and a very efficient officer, too.

Mr. MANN. I think there may be a question of doubt about it as to whether he could be named by name or whether he could be considered an employee of the House. As a matter of fact, he is an employee of the House and of the Senate, although he draws his pay through the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HARDWICK. He is under the direct control of the Joint Committee on Printing. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have some authorities here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will read:

A general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. Thus the following have been held to be germane: To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory.

So when the Senate amendment provides for a class of employees it is germane for the House to specify another class of employees entirely different whose salary it wishes to increase. It seems to me that the precedent is precisely on all fours. Here is another precedent:

To a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities; to a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship, an amendment embodying a third.

These are the decisions in the Manual. We are not confined to the classes of employees whose compensation the Senate wants to increase; we can add another and separate class by amendment if we want to, because the subject matter of the Senate amendment is the increasing of the compensation of certain employees who perform services for the two Houses of Congress. Certainly it would be a most narrow construction of parliamentary law if the Speaker were to hold arbitrarily that the House could not specify another class of employees in connection with the Senate proposition. There is no rule of parliamentary law, no precedent, and I challenge the gentleman from New York to produce one anywhere, to the effect that when the Senate names certain classes of employees whose compensation it desires to increase the House can go no further in naming another class of employees whose compensation it wishes to increase. It seems to me that the proposition I announce is founded on such evident common sense and that the precedents are so squarely on all fours with it, that there ought not to be any doubt in the mind of the Speaker as to how he should rule. I do not care on what roll they are carried. These men perform service for the two Houses of Congress. I do not care whether they are paid from the Printing Office, the Post Office Department, or anywhere else. If the Senate undertakes to increase the pay of certain classes of employees who serve the two Houses of Congress or either House of Congress, we, by amendment, if we wish to, have the right to either add to or subtract from their proposition, and unless that be true, there will be no possibility of the two Houses meeting each other on equal terms and finally enacting legislation with equal rights and equal privileges with each other.

The SPEAKER. To begin with, the Chair thinks the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that the Chair stated the limitation too narrowly, is correct. The Chair has long been familiar with the precedents cited by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but never could see the reason for them. It seems to be the rule, and it has been so decided more than once, that where a bill is under consideration to admit one Territory, it is obnoxious to the rule to add another, or where there is under consideration a bill to construct one public building, it is obnoxious to the rule to undertake to amend it by adding others; but where there are several in the original proposition—that is, where there is a bill under consideration for the construction of more than one public building—then it is within the rule to amend by adding another public building or buildings, or where there is a bill to admit two or more Territories, it is in order to add another or others; but in a bill to admit only one Territory an amendment to add another or others is not in order. The current of opinion seems to be uniform in respect to that.

Let us see what this case under consideration is. The amendment reads:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and the employees of the Senate and House of Representatives—

And so forth.

That is one class. The second class follows—and the employees on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building—

And so forth.

There we have two classes. The Hardwick amendment proposes to add another class. The Chair thinks the point of order not well taken, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I now make the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who offers an amendment to the amendment of his colleague, the effect of which is to increase the allowance under the law paid to each Member of Congress for clerk hire. I call attention to the fact that under the law each Member of Congress is paid $1,500 annually to reimburse him for money paid in the employment of clerks, and that a provision to appropriate an additional month's compensation, or one-twelfth of the amount fixed by law, is not germane to the provisions to give extra compensation to employees of the Senate and of the House. These men are not employees of either the Senate or the House. They are the employees of the Members of Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the Chair and the House for just a moment. The legislative, judicial, and executive act of 1912, and also the act of 1911, contained a provision that the salaries for the clerks of Members shall be paid to them, provided there shall be placed upon the roll of employees of the House the name of such clerk of Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman the statute there?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have sent for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have before me the act containing the appropriation for 1914, and there is no such provision as that in it.

Mr. BARTLETT. And it was in the act of 1913.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of 1914 provides—

That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments.

But the appropriation itself reads as follows:

Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $1,500 per annum, in monthly installments.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the act of 1911 and the acts of 1912 and 1913, after providing for money to pay clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, provided that the clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners should be placed upon the roll of employees of the House. I will read it. The act of 1913 provided as follows:

To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $1,500 per annum, in monthly installments; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials—

And so forth.

Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerks of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I read.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did the gentleman read the proviso?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did. It does not say what the gentleman from Georgia asserted—that the payment should be direct to the clerk.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman to so contend, and I read the proviso to show it did not.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did misunderstand him.

Mr. BARTLETT. But this provision I never misunderstood, Mr. Speaker, because the provision of this act is the result of my own work. In 1911 by a vote of the House an amendment was made to the appropriation bill providing that before any money should be paid for clerk hire to Members that the clerks should be placed upon the roll of employees of the House and that the money should be paid only to such Members as complied with this requirement. That passed the House and went to the Senate and came back in this form.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. O Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman from Georgia is mistaken. The Senate never undertook to interfere with the House. That provision as it is now in the act of 1914 is in the exact form in which it was adopted by the House the first time. It is not legislation. It was a limitation upon that particular appropriation bill, and it only got in as a limitation, and it is carried in the present appropriation bill as a limitation and not as legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, well, the gentleman can call it what he pleases. Mr. Speaker, it may not be legislation, but it ought to be legislation that put the clerks to Members upon the roll of the House, as they ought to be, and paid as employees of the House. That is what ought to be done and that is what was attempted to be done. Of course we did not accomplish all we wanted.

Mr. CRISP. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman offered an amendment providing that they be paid directly?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. But that amendment was amended in the House before it was adopted in accordance with existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I take the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina to be the fact; I do not know. Now, Mr. Speaker, the secretaries to the Senators are provided for in this amendment of the Senate, and will be paid an extra month's pay if agreed to. The clerks to Members of the Senate are on the Senate roll, and if you pass this provision for an extra month's pay you pay every clerk of a Senator an extra month's pay who already receive $150 per month. Now, if we are to do this—if we are to pay the employees of the Senate and the House and pay the clerks to Senators—if we agree to this amendment, I think in fairness we ought to agree to pay our own clerks, and this provision provides that the Clerk of the House shall pay, not to the Members, Mr. Speaker, but shall pay to the clerks who are on the roll of the employees of the House, as provided for by existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. That is what he said before I called his attention to it. The provision does not provide—

Mr. BARTLETT. I said my amendment provided for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's amendment did, but the House adopted a different one.

Mr. BARTLETT. I said this amendment of mine provides for the payment to the clerks who are upon the roll of the employees of the House in pursuance of this and not for payment of it to the Members. Now, that is what the amendment provides. Mr. Speaker, it is as germane as the one that was offered, because they are on the roll of the employees of the House, and if the roll be consulted it will be ascertained that the Clerk of the House does not pay any Member—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. In a minute. He does not pay any Member unless his clerk's name is on the roll. He ought not to do so unless that Member's employee is enrolled on the employees' roll, and I apprehend the Clerk follows the rule. My first object was that you might have a roll, and the next purpose I had in view was that the clerk of a Member should receive the money.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has just stated the effect of his amendment on the roll of the Clerk's office.

Mr. BARTLETT. On the roll of the employees of the House. That is the language of the statute.

Mr. MANN. It is the roll of the clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. This would authorize the clerks to have the extra compensation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman probably did not notice the language. These clerks do not now receive any compensation from the Government, and this amendment which the gentleman inserts his amendment into provides for the Clerk of the House to pay these employees a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law. Now, these clerks do not receive any compensation now paid to them by law; hence they would not if the gentleman's amendment prevailed. They would if he could get by a point of order. I would not have raised the point of order on the gentleman's amendment, hoping that if the House is to pay an extra month's salary it might fix up the gentleman's proposition. But as a point of order has been raised, let us understand, if it gets by the point of order, it has to be perfected in order to be of value.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act here provides the appropriation is to pay Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. What is it that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is going to read?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair desires the act showing the appropriation, and I send it to him.

The SPEAKER. The statute making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, on page 9, under the title of "Clerk hire, Members and Delegates," reads as follows:

To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $1,500 per annum, in monthly installments, $600,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is not that clearly paid by the Member as trustee for the clerk?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that in a sense that is true; but it does not say it shall be paid to the clerk. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. MANN. The Hardwick motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss the amendment a little.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe I have the floor. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is unquestionably, under the practice, entitled to the floor for an hour.

Mr. HARDWICK. How much time will the gentleman give me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us have 10 minutes to a side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course I will take it, but we ought to have an understanding about it.

Mr. FITZHENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZHENRY. I have a preferential motion which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it read, to see if it is preferential.

Mr. MANN. It can not be preferential.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZHENRY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 97 and concur in it with the following amendment: "Page 60, line 15, strike out the word 'first' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'fifteenth.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. A similar motion is pending, and it is not now in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I myself wish to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia and strike out the words "October 1" and insert "October 15."

Mr. MANN. The way to reach that is to divide the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and for that purpose I will ask for a division of the motion.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] made a motion.

Mr. MANN. Another amendment would be in order if you had the right of way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MANN. I want 10 minutes on this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what side of the question?

Mr. MANN. I do not know which side it shall be on. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the control of an hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to know which side the gentleman from Illinois is on, because I want to divide the time fairly.

Mr. MANN. We will take 10 minutes on this side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not concerned with the sides of the House, but with the sides of the question. I would like to know how much time is desired in favor of and against the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MANN. We will take care of that on this side.

Mr. HARDWICK. It might otherwise be 20 minutes on one side.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can do as he pleases about it. If he does not propose to yield, it will take more than 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I can find out which side the gentleman will speak on, I will be able to divide the time.

Mr. MANN. If a gentleman comes to me and wants time, I do not ask him which side he wants to speak on. That is a very bad practice, which has grown up on that side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the practice of that side when they have control of the time. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] requested that an adjustment of the time be made on each side. I control an hour, to dispose of it as I please, but I wish to be perfectly fair and allot it equally on both sides of the question. If the gentleman from Illinois will indicate on which side he will speak, I can allot the time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can do as he pleases about it. I have made my request, and I stand by it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the motion that I make, if it prevails, would restore what has been the practice of this House from the Twenty-seventh Congress down to and including the Sixty-first Congress.

For a period of 75 years, during every session of this Congress, long or short, this allowance was made to the employees of the two Houses of Congress once a year. It was made when the Democrats controlled this body, when great statesmen like Randall, Carlisle, and Crisp were in power and authority on this side. It was made when great statesmen like Henry Clay sat in power on this side of the Chamber, when it was occupied by the Whigs. This same provision was made under the leadership of equally distinguished Republicans—Blaine, Conkling, McKinley, Reed, and Cannon, and so on through a long and brilliant list of names. For 75 years without question the House and the Senate have dealt out this moiety to its honest, its hard-working, and in some cases its poorly paid employees. The Senate amendment included the officers and employees on the rolls of the Senate and House of Representatives and the employees on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building. Now, in the Senate, on the Senate roll are the clerks of each one of the 96 Senators of the United States. Unfortunately, I regret that the same is not true in this House, and the clerks of the different Representatives of the United States are not on any House roll. Therefore the Senate language does not include our clerks, although it does include their clerks.

The Senate language does not include the honest, hard-working reporters of this House and of the Senate; it does not include the faithful and efficient clerk of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It does not include the faithful and efficient Capitol police.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that we ought to agree to the Senate amendment, with the amendment I propose, including also the classes of employees last named. We have had a long and arduous session of Congress. To me and many of my colleagues on this side it has, it is true, been a labor of love; but after all, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we make nothing by cheeseparing on this question. It seems to me that by petty economies, while larger economies are neglected, we do not make reputation or capital for ourselves here or in the country, in our own estimation or in the estimation of our constituents.

Why, some men may ask, Should we pay these employees for an extra month? I will address myself to that question with the utmost candor, because, in the first place, these men get no mileage. Very few of these men live in the city of Washington. They come on a salary that may look reasonable to people on the outside who have not our intimate knowledge of the question, but, after all, after paying Washington prices and supporting their families, it does not amount to very much.

For 75 years they have had this extra month's pay without any question, and now, when prices are high, when these men are harder pushed than ever, when prices have been raised all along the line, they do not get as much as they did then. Personally, I would prefer, infinitely prefer, to increase their salaries 10 per cent on a level, all the way around.

Mr. KINDEL. Why not?

Mr. HARDWICK. Because we have not the opportunity at this time. But there are special reasons, if this is never done again, why these men should have this allowance now. They have been here through the snows of winter, through the suns of summer, through the winds of autumn, and it looks like the snow will fall again before they get any rest at all. They have been here in this city of high prices and expensive living all this time, working twice as long as they ordinarily would have to work during an ordinary session of Congress. We get mileage to compensate us to some extent for the expense of traveling between our homes and the Capital. They get no such compensation. In the majority of cases they are not highly paid. Some officers of the House do get good salaries. Six thousand five hundred dollars is, I believe, the highest, but the great mass of the men who will get this extra compensation get $1,500 a year or under. The doorkeepers that stand around the doors performing services for the House, and the elevator men, get, when it comes to support their families, what amounts to a mere pittance; and to-day I will venture the statement that the majority of them have not got money enough to get home unless they borrow it from some one here.

As far as I am concerned, and I am going to be perfectly frank, I believe in dealing with these men generously. I do not believe in cheeseparing economy, in small, pettifoggish, peanut politics. I thought two years ago, when we adopted this so-called "reform," that we made a serious mistake.

I have seen men who were most vociferous in their protests against this extra month's compensation turn and raid the Treasury for millions when they thought it would help them in their districts. That is fine economy that takes it out of a few of our own employees; economy that does not strike at the heart of things and hold down big appropriations and is not worth a cent to the people in this country. They balk at pennies, while they appropriate millions and hundreds of millions without the slightest hesitancy. Battleships, public buildings, good roads, river and harbor improvements, militia pay, and a thousand other projects are reaching out their insatiate hands toward the Federal Treasury. Most of these projects are worthy and necessary. To some extent they must be provided for, but while we are lavishing hundreds and thousands of millions it seems to me that if we really wish to economize we will have to turn our guns on larger game than our humble employees, and that if we are to finally present a creditable balance sheet for the inspection of the American people we can never accomplish it by skimping our faithful employees and economizing on them to the extent of a few hundreds or thousands of dollars while the outgo of the millions continues or increases.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my humble judgment the people of this country do not expect us to be niggardly with our employees. The people of our country do not think it wrong that we should give these men this extra compensation when they have had to undergo the extra expense and the extra and arduous labors of this long-drawn-out session. I know not what others may think, but for myself I say, without doubt, without hesitation, without fear, that I believe the people of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent on this floor have not that niggardly, narrow spirit that would lead them to condemn me for my stand on this matter. That, however, is not a controlling matter with me. I think the proposition I present is right. I think our employees ought to have this extra compensation, for they have given us extra service. I believe in efficient, well-paid help. I believe in being not only just, but if you want to put it in that way, generous, with these people. I know of scores of them who can hardly make both ends meet on the salaries that we allow. I know they have been here month after month under heavy expense, some of them with their families, and for one I do not begrudge this extra salary that will carry them back to their respective homes. They have given us faithful, honest, efficient service, and while I would prefer, if we could, to directly increase their salaries, particularly the lower grades of them, yet as we can not do it now, as the session is drawing to a close, and as they have been put to this heavy expense during all of this time and have performed these extra labors, I do not see why we can not safely follow the practices of 75 unbroken years and give them this extra month's pay.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may contend that it amounts to too much in the case of some of the elected officers of the House. It may be that will give them more than there was really any necessity for doing, in just one or two cases, but I think in the great majority of cases, particularly in the cases of men who get the smaller salaries, and of men who have salaries that hardly meet their bare necessities, this is not only right, but almost an act of necessity. The Senate does it without hesitation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can afford to be small about this. I do not know how the majority of the Members feel on this question. Of course, as far as my position is concerned, I do not care; although I hope that we will win. I believe in a liberal policy in this matter, and I have no fear that the country will misjudge those of us who feel as I do on this question. On the contrary, I believe the country is in favor of liberality in our dealings with these public servants, and I urge it upon every Member of this House. I do not know what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may contend about this matter.

Usually I have thought he was liberal about these things; but it may be that the onerous duties of the position which he holds has inclined to make him another Holman; but I would not want him to out-Holman Holman and jump on a thing which for years all of the great watchdogs of the Treasury, all of the great economists of the House, whether Whig, Democrat, Republican, Know-nothing, or what not, thought beneath them, thought too small to be legitimate game for the lions of debate in this House. I would hate to see the gentleman pounce on this sort of game. I suppose the gentleman does not want to hold out entirely against the Senate amendment. I suppose he wants to allow them to pay their employees extra compensation, even down to their private clerks; but I say let us treat our own, as far as we can, with equal liberality. Let us assert ourselves; let us not have such an unreasonable fear, such a great distrust of our people on this sort of matter. I believe the country is too big for it, too broad for it, too liberal for it, and I do not believe there is any necessity for any of us being intimidated by any such fear. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am not only not in favor of concurring in the Senate amendment with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, but I am not in favor of the Senate amendment at all. The most vicious practice of which I have knowledge has been the practice of the Congress of the United States voting an extra month's pay to the employees of the two Houses of the Congress. It is easy to be very generous with the money of the public to aid the persons who are closely identified with us in our work, but there is no justification for it under any circumstances. I assert that the employees of the two Houses of Congress are liberally paid for the services that they are called upon to render. They are not all high-class officials, but no matter what the grade occupied by any employee about this Capitol may be, in comparison with the compensation paid in other departments of the Government or the compensation paid in private life, these employees are liberally paid.

How can we justify the proposition to increase by one-twelfth the compensation of these employees because they are really called upon to render some services in the positions to which they have been appointed? Heretofore the practice has been, as the gentleman has stated, in the long session and in the short session to increase the compensation of these employees one-twelfth; employees who would come here in December and quit on the 4th of March would beseech and annoy and harass Members of Congress upon the theory that they were being unjustly treated, unfairly treated, while if the most of them would have had to perform the services of their position throughout the entire year as employees in other departments of the Government we would hear nothing about it. I know the employees of the House and of the Senate are competent, efficient, ambitious, and enthusiastic. I should like to know, however, and I do not speak now of any particular individual occupying any of these places—I should like to know some good reason why the Clerk of the House of Representatives, receiving a compensation of $6,500 a year, should be given an extra month's salary because we are required to remain in Washington so long. He should stay here anyway properly to discharge the duties of his office. Because we have had extra labor imposed on us some one argues that he should be given an extra month's pay.

The Sergeant at Arms is paid the same as the Clerk of the House—$6,500. He is the disbursing officer of the House. He should, if he properly performs his work, remain here in charge of the funds of the House; but because Congress is compelled to remain here, is that any reason that he should be given an extra month's pay? Mr. Speaker, I favor liberal compensation for the employees of the two Houses. I say I favor liberal compensation because of the character of the tenure of their office. Their tenure depends upon the fluctuations of the control of the House by the two political parties. It may be long or it may be short. I would pay these employees more liberally than they would be paid in any other department or in private life. I would not run so lavish in the payment of them that I could not justify under any circumstances the compensation they receive. I know it is not pleasant to antagonize these motions.

I should like, as most Members would, as all Members would, that the greatest prosperity should come to these employees, but this practice has been demoralizing to the House. It has been, in my opinion, demoralizing to the employees, because they have not only been accustomed to look for this extra compensation, but the tendency has been to create unnecessary and useless positions because it was so easy to get money for employees of the two Houses. Two years ago a Democratic House started a reform. It declared, upon examination, that the compensation of these employees was sufficient, was ample, was liberal. It stopped this practice, and it should never be again restored.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me right there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment. No one can justify the adoption of this amendment, that will incur an additional expenditure of $140,000, in order to furnish this additional compensation to these employees of the two Houses.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, the fact that in some previous Congress some Democratic caucus adopted some resolution on this matter did not seem to interfere with the gentleman yesterday when he stood up and fought very vigorously the assault of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not a Democratic caucus.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Democratic House, then, of a year or two ago. It did not bother the gentleman when we had the policemen up yesterday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did not. I said then it was a mistake.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say to the gentleman right now—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know that; but I say this: That we do not agree with you in your proposition that these men are overpaid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know you do not agree with me, or I do not think you would make the statement or introduce the amendment which you have. I am not criticizing the gentleman from Georgia. I am not surprised that what I have said has made him feel it necessary to say something further in justification of taking $140,000 out of the Treasury to pay this extra compensation to these employees.

I have no criticism of any Member of this House for what he does in the conscientious discharge of his duty. I am not the one to pass upon the propriety of the acts of Members. Those questions are settled elsewhere. I am simply presenting my reasons for antagonizing and opposing the payment of this extra money.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a question. The gentleman says the propositions included in my amendment amount to $140,000 a year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do.

Mr. HARDWICK. With the Senate amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The ones I have included in my amendment do not amount to that much.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The proposition is to include those mentioned in the gentleman's motion, which is to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The House part of it is almost infinitesimal. About $25,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman adds about $25,000 to about $115,000 proposed by the Senate, but he is in favor of the entire sum. I am opposed to any. We should be fair and liberal in these compensations. Anyone who will examine the appropriation act containing the salaries paid to these employees will easily ascertain that Congress has been liberal, if not very generous, in practically every instance.

How much time have I used myself, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of this House to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], to the effect that the adoption of this amendment would be in the nature of vicious legislation. This House has for years passed appropriation bills carrying larger salaries for the Senate employees than for the House employees. We are appropriating in every legislative bill $1,440 per annum for the services of the Senate messenger, and the same bill carries appropriations of $1,180 and $1,200 for messengers in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman understands, can not carry more than is authorized by law.

Mr. AUSTIN. We are discrediting the services of our own employees by appropriating in these appropriation bills from $20 to $30 a month less than we are voting to the corresponding officials of the Senate. Now, that is not only true of the messengers who have custody of the various doors leading into this Chamber, but it is virtually true of every corresponding officer in the Senate. Here is the last legislative appropriation bill, and the first thing this House ought to do—and I commend it to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—is to have an equalization in the salaries of the employees of the respective Houses. There is no more justice in paying a messenger in the Senate, or a clerk in the Senate, from $20 to $50 more a month for performing identical services to those the corresponding officers perform here, than there would be in paying a Senator of the United States $100 more per month than we pay the Members of the House.

Why, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who fights this meritorious proposition, yielded in the committee to a proposition to vote $16,100 to the Senators; for what? For 23 stenographers to such Senators as did not already have at least three appointments. In other words, we deny a simple act of justice to our faithful and efficient employees, and in the same breath we vote the people's money out to give a Senator of the United States an extra stenographer so as to give him four officials or subordinates about his office to do the work that we are forcing the Members of this House to do with one stenographer or one secretary. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a second?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, we are yielding to the Senate, under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the right to give to each Senator, even when he represents a State that is not half as big as some of the congressional districts, three stenographers to our one?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. Let me read this provision:

For 23 stenographers to Senators, from December 1, 1913, to June 30, 1914, both dates inclusive, at the rate of $1,200 per annum each, for Senators having less than three employees in connection with their official work, $16,100.

Now, our votes are going to write that provision into the law, and yet we are called upon here not to attempt to equalize the difference in the pay of the employees of the coordinate Houses of this Congress by voting our employees an extra month's pay. It is a reflection upon the manhood, the justice, and the fairness of the Members of this House that we ought not to tolerate for a moment. [Applause.] A Member of Congress who is afraid to vote for this piece of legislation, which is fair and just, is too much of a coward to sit here and make laws for the American people. Let him base it on something else. [Applause.]

Now, we are running this House with at least 100 officials less than we ran the Sixty-first Congress—thirty-odd less in the Doorkeeper's department and thirty-odd less in the Clerk's department of this House. They are doing the work now that it required a hundred more men to do. We voted for the 100 more men in that large force under the Republican administration of this House, and we voted a month's extra pay during every one of the sessions of the Sixty-first Congress—the first session, the special session, and the last regular session, and you sat on that side of the House without a protest against it and without a record vote against it. Now, simply because you have assumed responsibility here and are in the majority you are going to deny to your own people, your own employees, your own constituents, what you were willing to vote to your political opponents. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we had followed the Republican example in every instance, we would have been thrown out, just as you were thrown out. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. That never cut any figure whatever in the last campaign, and never influenced it. Over there you have said time and time again that you won the last election on the tariff question. You won it by virtue of a division in the Republican Party, and by nothing else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we began in 1844 with a Democratic Congress, that set the first precedent for a month's extra pay. In 10 Democratic Congresses a month's extra pay was voted—the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirty-first, Thirty-second, Thirty-third, Forty-sixth, Forty-eighth, Fiftieth, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses. In one Whig Congress, the Thirtieth, an extra month's pay was voted. The Republicans began voting an extra month's pay in the Thirty-fourth Congress, and continued that practice in the Thirty-eighth, the Thirty-ninth, the Forty-seventh, the Fifty-first, the Fifty-fifth, the Fifty-sixth, the Fifty-seventh, the Fifty-eighth, the Fifty-ninth, the Sixtieth, and the Sixty-first Congresses, making 12 Congresses in all. We for 34 years voted this increase in the way of percentage—10 per cent, then 20 per cent, and then 25 per cent. Since that time we have voted an extra month's pay.

Now, I want to say, as a Republican, that I will not stultify myself by voting against giving the Democratic employees a month's extra pay, when I voted to give it to the Republican employees. [Applause on the Republican side.] While I had no hand in the appointment of these men, yet they are faithful and efficient and deserve the encouragement and support of every Member of this House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have three employees accorded to me, as Republican floor leader, who are on the annual roll, and outside of the few minority employees of the House those would be the only ones on the minority side of the House, with the exception of the employee under the control of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], who would receive any financial benefit from this proposition.

I should like very much, so far as my own employees are concerned, to give them the extra money. I have often felt that way about personal employees. I would have liked to give them more money than they have ever received. I voted consistently, whenever the question was up and the Republicans were in control, to give the employees of the House the extra month's pay, and I have justified the position many times in my own opinion.

I am not prepared to force down the throats of economical Democrats this gross extravagance. [Laughter.] They won a presidential campaign upon the proposition of economy, based on cutting off the extra month's pay, and it seems to me they might keep up a consistent course for at least one year after the presidential election. Of course, I know full well that at the end of this Congress, the end of the short session, when half the Members on the Democratic side have not been returned, each having a petty employee working for the House, gentlemen on the Democratic side will rise with patriotic motives of charity superior to past and gone notions of economy, and that for that session at least they will vote the extra month's pay. But this is the first time in the history of the Government when it has been seriously proposed to pay the extra month's pay for an extra session of Congress. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] gives that as a reason. Why, at the session of Congress when the Payne law was passed the employees of the House swarmed around the Republican Members of the House, many of them coming to me, and wanted support, and we refused to give the extra month's pay.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. PALMER rose.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. To either one.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that the gentleman must remember that at the extra session of 1909 the extra month's pay was given by the Republican Congress.

Mr. MANN. I did not so remember it.

Mr. PALMER. That is the fact.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is true that every year while the Republicans had the House they did give that extra month's pay.

Mr. MANN. If we did not, we made a mistake.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I think I favored it and made many speeches in favor of the proposition. I am not prepared now to vote for the proposition until after I see—and I am not going to wait to find out—a majority of Democrats doing so. You have two-thirds majority in this House. If you do not have nerve enough to pay your own employees the money you would like to pay them and think they have not earned, do not ask us to do it for you. I do not think you have nerve enough to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I think gentlemen are in error respecting the length of time Congress has been paying the extra month's pay, or at least that is the information furnished by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who looked into the matter for Democrats when we came into power in this House two years ago. This matter was considered then very fully, and I think you will find that the first extra month's pay which was given was in the Fifty-fourth Congress, on March 3, 1879. In rare instances has Congress ever paid an extra month's pay for an extra session.

I do not know whether these employees want these places or not. They seem to. I do know that I have two young men on the pay roll as session employees, and I do know that the patronage committee notified me that owing to the increased membership I would have to give up one of them, and now these young men are both anxious to hold on and do not want to give up their places. These employees of the House and Senate who are on the annual roll get a 30-day leave with pay. Therefore they are working 11 months in the year, and now we propose to give them 13 months' pay in the year. It was justified here by some gentleman that it should be done on the mileage basis. On this theory it is grossly unfair, because a man living out in Washington or out in the middle portion of the Union would spend a great deal of money to come to Congress to perform the duties, while those living nearer would not have to spend any such sum. The reason as shown in debate why they ever paid congressional mileage was because in the location of this Capital, in the fixing of the salaries, there was necessarily involved the expense of getting to Congress, and it was at that time agreed that if the Congress should locate the Capital here on the Potomac River, the people living in Maine and Georgia might have mileage so that the compensation for services would be equalized.

What Congress ought to do, if it wants to do the fair thing, would be to put all of these employees on a mileage basis and let their salaries be the same. It is unwise legislation.

What sort of attitude will the Democrats be in before the country if we pass this amendment now? At the last session by an overwhelming majority, in a Democratic caucus, we voted that it was wrong. A resolution passed that Democratic caucus of Congressmen denouncing the extra month's pay. We took the position then before the election that the proper way to begin economy was to economize at home. We did that and in our campaign literature called attention to this economy. It is said by Josephus that Jerusalem was the cleanest city in the world because, according to the laws in Jerusalem, every man was called upon to sweep in front of his own door. Now, there are Members of Congress who have relatives on the pay roll; there are Members who perhaps have their sons and daughters on the pay roll. I have no criticism of them for that. I know there are Senators who do the same thing, and yet they are put in the attitude of voting an extra month's pay to their own family; and these men that do it do that which, at least, would be embarrassing to me.

Do we mean what we say? Do we mean that we believe in economy? If we do, then we ought not, when just before a presidential election, before we carried the country, a Democratic House presided over by the Speaker, led by Mr. UNDERWOOD, our floor leader—when we were before the people in that presidential election we said that we believed in economy, and we then stated in the campaign and in the speeches and we filled the Record in reference to cutting off the extra month's pay with statements that the only place where the Democrats could economize was in the House, because that was the only branch of the Government that we held.

When we made that statement I believed it; but if we shall turn our faces now because you have brought a few men from home, put them on the pay roll, you will be doing the very thing that my good Republican friends have been doing in the past. In God's name, do not do it. I would not have an employee on the pay roll with me—I would discharge him if I had the power to do it—who would endeavor to influence my vote on a proposition involving, as I think it does, a matter of principle and honesty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. Sisson. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. Sisson. Somebody stated a moment ago that it would be cowardly and pusillanimous for a man to take the position that I now take; that he ought not to have the right to represent the people on the floor of this House. I want to say to the gentleman that when men are willing to vote for men to do

11 months' work and get 12 months' salary and then put an extra thirteenth month on, it comes devilish near being that which might be denounced in stronger language than mere cowardice.

When you say that a man is cowardly because he endeavors to protect the Public Treasury, when you say that a man is cowardly because he is not willing to stand by that which he believes to be right—when you make a statement of that kind you make it evidently without well considering what you are doing, and you have a contempt for every man who does not vote for what you wish. I believe the gentleman says that he never voted for a bill to tax the people and never voted against an appropriation bill except because it is too small. I do not believe in that proposition. I believe that the taxes put into the Public Treasury should be paid out for good, honest, and efficient service. [Applause.]

This Democratic House can not afford to support this amendment. It was known and understood that when any Congressman put a man's name on the pay roll of the House that the Democratic policy would be to only pay for 12 months' work in each year. No employee can complain, for he knew that when he asked for the job. Let us stand by our platform and our principles.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, it is an extremely difficult and disagreeable thing, if not indeed an ungracious act, on the part of any man who has a spark of generosity within him to oppose gifts, gratuities, or increase of compensation to loyal, faithful, and efficient employees. My experience with the employees of this House has been that they are uniformly efficient, that they have done their work well. Some of them are underpaid, and many of them, in my judgment, are overpaid. But as for me, I have no hesitation in saying that such of them as are underpaid ought to have their salaries increased, and if any are receiving too much they ought to have their salaries cut rather than to return to the vicious practice of appropriating large sums of money out of the Public Treasury without any consideration whatever.

I oppose this Senate amendment, not on the ground of economy, because I recognize the amount, as figures go in this great Government, is not large; but I oppose it because I am against the principle of taking the public money and distributing it without any quid pro quo. These gentlemen who are upon the rolls of the House have come here at a salary which they knew about in advance, with a full knowledge that the House had taken a position in the last Congress almost unanimously against the extra month's pay, willing to serve their country here for the salaries fixed by the statute, and it seems to me it does not lie in their mouths to claim that the salaries are not as high as they would like them to be.

I thought that in the last Congress this practice had been definitely and finally disposed of, because, after a good deal of argument and we came to a vote, it was decided with practical unanimity that that practice should cease. The vote in the last Congress, two years ago, upon that question was 181 to 6. Not a single Democrat voted to take this money out of the Treasury, and only six Republicans upon a roll call had the courage to say to the people that they were in favor of making this gratuity of the public money.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The solidity of the Democratic vote is explained by the fact that at that time we had some caucus action pretty hastily jumped up, is it not?

Mr. PALMER. I believe the Democrats voted that way because they believed that way, and there has not anything happened since which would change their judgment.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman, I believe, was chairman of the caucus; there has been no caucus action this year.

Mr. PALMER. There has been no caucus action this year. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says this will add $150,000 to this appropriation bill. As a matter of fact, what it means is an increase in the pay of employees of the House and Senate of at least $420,000 in every Congress, because if this proposition is agreed to to-day it will establish a precedent from which we can not escape next time; and with three sessions in a Congress, as we have been having ever since I have been here and as we are likely to have in the future, it means that 3 months' extra pay shall be given to every employee during the 24 months of his service. That would amount to nearly half a million dollars. Well, I would like to see these efficient employees have the money; I would like to see them rewarded for their services; but I can not bring myself to believe that we have any right to take from the Public Treasury this large sum as a gift to them. [Applause. Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment I have submitted in the following respect: Add to the end of the Senate amendment the following language:

To Members and Delegates in Congress and Resident Commissioners a sum equal to one month's allowance for clerk hire.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am ready to vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question upon the Senate amendment and pending motion.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to hear the amendment read, so as to know the parliamentary status.

Mr. MANN. It has been read a half a dozen times.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. I object, and demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to another reading of the amendment, and demands the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The roll was called, and prior to the announcement of the result the following occurred:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered, and to dispense with the further call of the roll.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to vacate the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered and the roll call itself and to dispense with a further roll call. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman that he add to his request that the motion is disagreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. There will be no opposition on that point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All right.

Mr. FOWLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will that vacate the roll call so far as its appearance in the Record is concerned?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the roll call, so far as it went, would appear in the Record. The roll call is not finished yet. The roll call was not completed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question?

Mr. MANN. My colleague [Mr. FOWLER] has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not want the roll call to appear in the Record?

Mr. MANN. It has not been completed, because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the roll call ought to be left out.

Mr. MANN. The roll call has not yet been completed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. MANN. The request was to vacate the order and to dispense with further proceedings under the roll call.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And vacate the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FALCONER. Do I understand that there is no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the roll call appear up to the place where the roll was made or is the roll expunged from the Record?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not be a part of the Record if the order is vacated. It can not be in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The whole goes out. From the time that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rose and demanded the roll call down to the present minute, everything goes out. That is the only way to make a clean Record.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, up to this point in the call of the roll the "ayes" are a little over 50, and the "noes" are about 150.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed.

Mr. MANN. That statement will appear in the Record anyway. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to further insist on the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment numbered 97.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report Senate amendment numbered 107.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asked for two minutes in which to make a personal statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] took some exceptions to some remarks that I made because he construed my remarks to be a reflection upon his integrity. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that such a thought never entered my mind, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin realized just how high he stands in this House for integrity such a thing would never have entered his mind. [Applause.]

I disclaim, Mr. Speaker, any purpose or any intention to reflect upon the integrity of the gentleman for the reason that I have stated, that there has never been since I have been in the House with him—and I feel quite sure that there never will be—any occasion for anybody to reflect upon his integrity. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on amendments numbered 27 to 33, inclusive, which I thought I had obtained when I spoke, but which the Clerk advises me that I did not obtain.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendments numbered 27 to 33, both inclusive. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendments numbered 27 to 33, inclusive. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] and that of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 107: On page 75, line 1, insert the following:

"MONUMENT TO COMMEMORATE THE WOMEN OF THE CIVIL WAR.

"To make payment of a part contribution to the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a memorial in the District of Columbia to commemorate the service and the sacrifices of the women of the United States, North and South, for the sick and wounded in war, $400,000: Provided, That said memorial shall be a building monumental in design and character and shall be used as the permanent headquarters of the American Red Cross and shall cost, with the site, not less than $700,000: Provided further, That the sum hereby appropriated shall not be payable until there shall have been assured by private subscription an additional sum of $300,000: Provided further, That the money hereby appropriated shall not be paid for any site nor toward the construction of any memorial unless the site and plan for the proposed building shall have been approved by a commission consisting of the Secretary of War of the United States, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, and the president of the American Red Cross. The plans of said memorial shall likewise be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts. The expenditure for said site and memorial shall be made under the direction of the commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, and the president of the American Red Cross, and the said memorial shall be constructed under the supervision of an officer of the Corps of Engineers appointed by the Secretary of War, who shall act as the executive disbursing officer of the commission: Provided further, That the title to the site procured shall be taken by and the building erected thereon shall be the property of the United States, but the American Red Cross shall at all times be charged with and be responsible for the care, keeping, and maintenance of the said memorial and grounds without expense to the United States, subject to such further direction and control as may be provided by law: And provided further, That should the commission hereby created be unable to acquire a suitable site at a price deemed by the commission to be fair, it is authorized to institute condemnation proceedings in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 13, 1890, providing a site for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 26, chap. 887)."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 107.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 107 and concur with an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 75, line 19, by adding, after the word "Congress," the words "the chairman of the House Committee on the Library."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if it is possible for the House to agree on some brief period for debate on this amendment. If so, I would be glad to do it.

Mr. GILLET. I only want 5 minutes. I think 20 minutes on this side would be sufficient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have been in session nearly 7 hours. If the gentleman has 20 minutes on that side, I suppose we will have to have 20 minutes on this side.

Mr. GILLET. I will agree to 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are Members who will speak on that side in favor of your proposition?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I want a little time on that side.

Mr. GILLET. If I give the gentleman from Indiana time, I shall want 20 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will agree to let me make a five-minute statement, I will present it in such a way that I will present both sides, and I think it will be unnecessary for other Members to speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLET. I am perfectly willing to wait until the gentleman makes his five-minute speech.

Mr. MANN. I think we had better agree on some time. If we do not, it will take longer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I can state what the facts are, and that gentlemen on my statement will be satisfied that I have presented both sides so clearly that we can vote and quit.

Mr. GILLET. I am willing to try the experiment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment proposes to appropriate $400,000 as a part contribution for a building in the city of Washington for the Red Cross. The total limit for the site and building is $700,000. It is not now authorized by law. The situation about the matter is as follows: A gentleman in New York, quite old—I think in the neighborhood of 80 years of age—is willing to contribute $300,000 toward this structure if the other $400,000 can be obtained. It is proposed that the United States shall contribute the other $400,000; that a commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the president of the Red Cross Society shall have charge of the acquisition of the site, either by purchase or condemnation, and the control of the construction of the building, the plans for which must be approved by the Fine Arts Commission.

The work is to be under the control of an engineer officer appointed for that purpose by the Secretary of War, who shall be the executive officer of the commission. The title to the property is to be taken in the name of the United States. The premises and the building are to be in the name of the United States, and the Red Cross is to give suitable guaranty that the United States will forever be absolved from any expense toward the upkeep of the building.

The Red Cross Society since its incorporation has collected and distributed to relieve distress, not only in this country but throughout the world, something in the neighborhood of $12,000,000. It is suggested by those who are so much interested in this organization and its good work that as it has been incorporated by Congress, as the President of the United States, if I recollect correctly, is now and has been for some time made the honorary president, as its work is of such an extraordinary character that Congress should take advantage of this opportunity to make this appropriation and furnish these headquarters, and to do it to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States, both of the North and of the South, in their care and attention to the wounded during the Civil War. [Applause.]

I believe that accurately states the situation. The building is not authorized by law. It is put on this bill as a Senate amendment. I was inclined myself to move to concur in the amendment earlier in the day, but after my experience in attempting to concur in an amendment for an appropriation of $25,000 which Congress authorized at the last session to enable the President, the Vice President, and the Speaker of the House to perform certain duties devolving upon them, I thought I should prefer to test the sentiment of the House and its desire for rigid economy by moving to insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment. I believe that the Members of the House understand the situation, and I hope we may have a vote. I believe it to be so well understood, Mr. Speaker, that we can take a vote at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama if he desires to address the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should state that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], leaders on each side of the House, as I am informed, intend to vote with the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of the proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New York has stated the matter very clearly, and my judgment is inclined to leave it to the House now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House for merely two minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of reckless expenditures. I think I vote for economy about as regularly as any Member of this House, but if there is one great meritorious organization in this country for the relief of the destitute and the sick it is this great Red Cross organization. [Applause.] Here is an opportunity to construct this building at half the cost of what it would ordinarily be, because a patriotic citizen is willing to give half of the money. I believe the hour has come when Congress ought to accept. It will be a credit to the Nation, and it will sustain and hold up this organization which is so much needed in times of distress and want. I shall most heartily favor concurring in the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to give the name of the gentleman who contributed this money. He is Mr. Scrymser, of New York.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment 107 and concur in the same with an amendment which has been reported.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the several votes on the several Senate amendments was laid on the table.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire of the gentleman from New York whether he can inform us when the conferees will be able to again report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not asked for a conference. Inasmuch as the House has considered very thoroughly all of these amendments, and that upon those upon which it has insisted on its disagreement to the Senate amendments the vote has been so overwhelming, I anticipate it is useless to have a further conference—that the Senate will recede from its amendments.

Mr. Sisson. Then, I take it, it would be well for Members to remain here until this bill is finally disposed of?

Mr. MANN. It will be well for them to remain here until Congress has finally adjourned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is possible to enter into a pact about adjourning until further business comes up?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is quite possible to enter into a pact by a vote of the House and the Senate to adjourn until the next regular session of Congress. [Applause.] That will be until business comes up. But I will say frankly to my friend from Alabama that if the House remains in session I expect to remain here and to make it just as unpleasant as I possibly can for Democrats who go home. I think they ought to stay here and do business if the Congress is to remain in session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can advise me as to the position on that side of the House with respect to resisting an effort to adjourn for three days at a time unless we have a quorum present?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask to have the House meet every day, as long as we have the power, and have a roll call every day when the gentleman moves to adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to desecrate Columbus Day by working?

Mr. MANN. I intend to honor it by working.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk read:

Mr. McKellar requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

Mr. SMITH of New York requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. FRANCIS requests leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these requests will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to any leave of absence on account of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the request of Mr. McKellar and Mr. Francis. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Illinois will not consent to make an agreement respecting adjournment. Unquestionably we have not a quorum here at this time, and therefore I move that the House adjourn until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Monday, October 13, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination of Lemon Bay, Fla., to Gasparilla Sound (H. Doc. No. 247); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Sinepuxent Bay, Md., from the mouth of St. Martins River south, with a view to a channel 5 feet in depth (H. Doc. No. 248); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Quiver River, Miss. (H. Doc. No. 249); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Bayou Chastaing, La. (H. Doc. No. 251); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of the channel from St. Johns River, through Lake Dexter, thence to Lake Woodruff, thence to St. Johns River below Hawkinsville, Fla. (H. Doc. No. 252); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 8835) to provide for the issuance of legal-tender Treasury notes of the United States, redeemable in gold coin or its equivalent, to be secured by the deposit in the Treasury of outstanding bonds of the United States or first mortgages upon agricultural lands, not exceeding 60 per cent of the value of such lands, exclusive of improvements, and for the loaning of the Treasury notes so secured to the owners of the security at 2 per cent interest, payable semi-annually, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 8844) opening the surplus and unallotted lands in the Colorado River Indian Reservation to settlement and entry under the provisions of the Carey Land Acts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 8845) to purchase a motor vehicle for the excise board of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 284) directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to report a bill for the construction of three battleships; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 8836) for the relief of James A. Miller, representative of the heirs of James M. Miller, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FREAR: A bill (H. R. 8837) for the relief of George W. Moore; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8838) to correct the naval record of George R. Gray; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8839) granting a pension to Julia A. Oswald; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 8840) to quiet title and possession with respect to certain private land claims in the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8841) granting a pension to Dora Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8842) granting an increase of pension to Frances Rollins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMALL: A bill (H. R. 8843) granting a pension to William R. Hardison; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the American Roumanian Jewish Emancipation Committee of New York, N. Y., relative to oppression of and discrimination against the Jews by the Roumanian Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of 417 employees of the Dorce Works, American Sheet & Tin Plate Co., protesting against the dissolution of the United States Steel Corporation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FIELDS: Petition of citizens of the ninth congressional district of Kentucky, favoring the passage of legislation compelling concerns selling goods direct to the consumer by mail to contribute their portion of the funds for the development of the local community, county, and State; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

Monday, October 13, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of the Woman's Club of Hope, N. Dak., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Hetch Hetchy bill, granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7898) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GILLET managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7898) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes; recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 44 and 61 to the bill, and agrees to the same; recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8 and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107, and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 82, 93, and 97 to the bill.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. J. Res. 111. Joint resolution to authorize the reinstatement of Adolph Unger as a cadet in the United States Military Academy; and

H. J. Res. 132. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the Sixth National Corn Exposition, to be held at Dallas, Tex., during the month of February, 1914.

TARIFF DUTY ON WOOL.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the paper I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the tariff debate of 1889 Senator Zeb Vance, of North Carolina, read in the Senate a piece of doggerel entitled, "A Girl with One Stocking—A Protective Pastoral."

("Composed and arranged for the old spinning wheel; and respectfully dedicated to that devoted friend of protected machinery and high taxes, the Senator from Rhode Island.")

It is so appropriate to reproduce it just at this time, when we have enacted another tariff law, that I ask for its republication.

With free wool, "Mary" will have to forego the 56 per cent and let her women friends wear stockings on both legs instead of only one—something they have not been able to do in more than 20 years. I read it years ago, and clipped it for my scrapbook. I have recently had it looked up in the Record, and find it appeared January 21, 1889.

Our Mary had a little lamb,
And her heart was most intent
To make its wool beyond its worth
Bring 56 per cent.
But a pauper girl across the sea
Had one small lamb also,
Whose wool for less than half that sum
She'd willingly let go.
Another girl who had no sheep,
No stockings—wool nor flax—
But money enough just to buy
A pair without the tax,
Went to the pauper girl to get
Some wool to shield her feet,
And make her stockings, not of flax
But of wool complete.
When Mary saw the girl's design
She straight began to swear
That she'd make her buy both wool and tax
Or let one leg go bare.
So she cried out: "Protect Reform!
Let pauper sheep wool free!
If it will keep both her legs warm
What will encourage me?"
So it was done, and people said
Where'er that poor girl went,
One leg was warmed with wool and one
With 56 per cent.
Now praise to Mary and her lamb,
Who did the scheme invent,
To clothe the one-half a girl in wool
And one-half in per cent.
All honor, too, to Mary's friend,
And all protective acts,
That clothe the rich in wool
And wrap the poor in tax.

The correspondent of the Chicago Herald of that date, in sending the account of it to his paper, commented as follows:

The reading of this piece of doggerel was received with shouts of laughter, even Republican Senators leaning back in their seats and giving unrestrained way to their mirth. As for the people in the galleries, they screamed and yelled frantically, and when Senator Vance sat down they kept up their uproarious applause until the North Carolina orator gravely inclined his head in acknowledgment.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to present the following unanimous-consent agreement, and I ask that the same be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 8, 1914, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 1, being a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women; and that not later than the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on Thursday, the 29th day of January, A. D. 1914, the Senate will proceed without further debate to vote upon any amendment that may then be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the joint resolution, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the unanimous-consent agreement offered by the Senator from Arizona. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, while I hope the currency bill will be disposed of long before January, I think we should not give unanimous consents to consider other bills until it has been disposed of. For that reason for the present I shall object. I hope long before January that the currency bill will have passed, and then I will be pleased to consent that the measure pressed by the Senator from Arizona be assigned to a special day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the message from the House relative to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House bill 7898, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 44 and 61 of the bill (H. R. 7898) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes," and agrees to the same.

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the said amendment strike out "or existing regulations" and insert "or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal."

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107, and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 19 of said amendment, after "Congress," insert "the chairman of the House Committee on the Library."

Mr. OVERMAN. I move the adoption of the conference report, and I will then move that the Senate recede from its amendments in dispute and concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 82 and 107. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator whether there were any changes made in the conference report with reference to the transfer of cases which are pending before the Commerce Court?

Mr. OVERMAN. No change was made, except a verbal change in regard to the transfer by the 31st of December, when the court expires. The cases will be transferred, but there are some cases which have been argued and are now in the hands of judges, and we inserted some verbiage in order that the judges might decide those cases that already have been argued. But everything is to be transferred on the 31st day of December.

Mr. BORAH. Those were the cases I had in mind, cases which have been argued and submitted and which are now in such a condition that the judges may decide them.

Mr. OVERMAN. The judges may decide those. That is the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate I am going to ask the Senate to concur in. The only difference made by the House amendment is some verbal change. I want to inform the Senate as to what the disagreements are, but first I will ask the Senate to adopt the conference report.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to inquire what is the amendment to amendment numbered 8. I ask that that be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 in said amendment strike out the words "or existing regulations" and insert "or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal."

Mr. OVERMAN. That is verbiage where the bond required by the department is to be given. Now I ask for the adoption of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire whether the Senator from North Carolina has yet sent to the desk the report?

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he make his explanation before the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. OVERMAN. The rule is first to adopt the report, and then I shall move to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate and to disagree to the other Senate amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that no report has yet been made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I send the report to the desk and ask for its adoption.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before any motion is made or question put on the adoption of the report I should like to inquire what has been the fate of the appropriation for the purpose of maintaining mints and assay offices in the West.

Mr. OVERMAN. That will come up after the reading of the report. I will explain it after the report has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7898) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 7, 9, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 26, 40, 43, 48, 51, 66, 73, 75, 80, 81, and 100.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 12, 14, 16, 19, 20, 24, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 52, 53, 55, 56, 57, 59, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 68, 70, 71, 72, 74, 76, 78, 79, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 98, 99, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, and 106, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Boston, Mass., immigrant station: The authority to construct the immigration station at Boston, Mass., is transferred to the Treasury Department, together with the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made therefor, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the construction of said station within the existing limit of cost and under conditions of existing law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "cost," in line 18 of said amendment down to and including the last line thereof, and insert the following: "not exceeding $65,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Beginning in line 11 of said amendment, after the word "system," strike out all of the matter proposed up to and including the word "thereto" in line 13; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "properly," in line 2 of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the word "necessarily"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment in lieu of the sum "$9,600" insert the sum "$9,000," and in line 5 of said amendment in lieu of the sum "$1,950" insert the sum "$1,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert the following: "$3,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 67, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add before the matter inserted by said amendment the following: "And the latter to be transferred to the district courts if not decided by the Commerce Court before December 1, 1913"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After said amendment insert the following: "All furniture, carpets, and other property of the Commerce Court is turned over to the Department of Justice and the Attorney General is authorized to supply such portion thereof as in his judgment may be proper and necessary to the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment the word "appointment"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "fourteen," and in line 7 of said amendment strike out "$16,650" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$11,925"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on amendments numbered 8, 10, 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 44, 61, 82, 93, 97, and 107.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,

LEE S. OVERMAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,

C. L. BARTLETT,

FREDK. H. GILETT,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, was amendment numbered 61 agreed to as it is printed in the bill on page 37?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, we finally concurred in the Walsh-Nelson amendment. The House conferees insisted on the provision as it came from the other House; the conferees on the part of the Senate insisted on the Senate amendment; the conferees could not agree, and the matter was taken up upon the floor of the other House. The House then agreed to the Senate amendment known as the Walsh-Nelson amendment.

Let us first have the report adopted, Mr. President, and then I will make my statement. I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina what considerations induced the Senate conferees to recede on amendment No. 21, carrying out the law of March 4, 1913, authorizing the expenditure of $5,000 for the preparation of designs and estimates for a national archives building in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senate and the House conferees could not come to an agreement on that matter, as well as on some other matters. The appropriation for the memorial bridge of $25,000 was similarly situated. The House and the Senate had agreed to appoint a commission and to authorize an appropriation of $25,000 for the preparation of designs for the memorial bridge, as they had also agreed to provide an appropriation for designs for a national archives building. The conferees on the part of the House of Representatives refused to agree to any of these propositions, saying that they could come in on a bill subsequently; that this bill was not the proper place for such appropriations, and that under the rules of the House, this being an urgent deficiency appropriation bill, they would not agree to those amendments. Of course, the Senate conferees insisted on all of those amendments; some of them were carried to the floor of the other House, and the House stood by their conferees on the matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I fail to understand the theory upon which all of these construction propositions, or measures for the construction of buildings or other structures, should be grouped together and treated as one whole, as if there were no distinction between them. I could readily understand that there might not be any emergency for the construction of a memorial bridge. I am in favor of it, but it is not an emergency. We have been trying for 25 years to get started upon a plan that would provide a fireproof building to preserve the invaluable records of the Government. We are having fires almost every few months which jeopardize millions of dollars' worth of records and documents which could not be replaced at all if they were destroyed, as, for instance, the fires which have occurred periodically in the Geological Survey Building—I think the last one burned up $25,000 worth of documents, and very nearly burned up records and documents estimated to be worth $2,000,000—and which are liable to occur any day. It is a very small item; and I fail to see why a distinction should not have been made between an appropriation of that kind, which would put this project in the way of fulfillment, and appropriations for other purposes not urgent or important.

Mr. OVERMAN. There really was no exception made, as I think the Senator from Washington will see if he will examine the bill. There is no question but that the Senator can hereafter get his proposition through, because the conferees on the part of the Senate were thoroughly in favor of it, and I think the House also favors it. I think there will be no trouble about getting a proposition for the purpose through in its proper place; but the conferees on the part of the other House did not think that it was an urgent deficiency. The only exception made, if it might be termed an exception, was with regard to the Red Cross Building. There was an emergency in that matter, as the Senator will appreciate without my going fully into the details here. The reason for that action was because certain persons, some of whom are very old, are going to subscribe large amounts to the society, and the society desires to get the money. If they are to get the money, something must be done for the Red Cross Society at once. That, however, was all thrashed out here on the floor; and, in a measure, while it looks to be an exception, it is an emergent matter. I think the Senator will find that is the only exception in the conference report. The House would not stand for any other exception. We endeavored to secure a complete agreement, though, in fact, we did not get an agreement, but broke up with a disagreement, and the bill was carried back to the other House. The amendments which I am going to discuss directly were taken up on the floor of the House; some of them were agreed to and some of them were disagreed to. The Senator's amendment providing an appropriation of $5,000 for plans for an archives building went out; but I think it will be provided for in a few months, when there will be another appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, that is what is always said in such cases. The Senator from North Carolina has just as much interest, I assume, in this amendment as I have.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am in full accord with the Senator, but I take the position the House takes, that it is not an emergency right now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I differ from the House in that regard. I think if there are any emergencies contained in this bill, that is certainly one of them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is simply, however, to provide for plans for the construction of a building. It seems to me every building has to go through the same process, and it can not be considered an emergency. It may be an important thing, and necessary to be put through without loss of time under ordinary methods, but a deficiency bill is not presumed to cover matters of that kind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does cover them, and has from time immemorial covered them. Whether or not the provision for a public building is an emergency depends upon what the building is intended for. It might not be an emergency to provide for the building of a post office in some town that does not need a new post-office building, but, if the Senator were informed about the condition of the public records in this city, the manner in which they are kept, corded up like dry wood, in buildings that are not fireproof, being destroyed by moisture in some places and ruined by the accumulation of dust and by the manner in which they are stored in other places, the Senator would agree that it is an emergency measure to begin the plans for an adequate archives building to preserve those records of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that I am in full accord with the idea expressed by him that there should be erected a national archives building. We all recognize the fact that that is absolutely necessary; but this bill is to supply urgent deficiencies. An appropriation for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Washington does not fall under the designation of a deficiency, and I myself believe that the House was perfectly right in disagreeing to the amendment. I wish to say to the Senator, however, that I have not the least doubt that an item covering this matter can be put into an appropriation bill at the regular session without any opposition either in the Senate or in the House. I have confidence in Congress that this action will be taken, because four or five cases within the last three or four years have demonstrated the fact that some of the most valuable records of the Government of the United States have been put in jeopardy for want of such a building.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Many of them can not be reproduced at all. They are invaluable, and you can not replace many of them.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be impossible to reproduce many of them, especially the records of the Geological Survey.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate—

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. With the permission of the Senator from Washington, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah why he calls this an urgent deficiency bill? This bill was up for discussion some time ago, and I discovered the fact that it abolishes one of the courts of the United States, assumes to abolish two or three circuit judgeships; in addition to that, provides rules of procedure for our Federal courts, and during the expiring hours of the session, when the bill was considered, an amendment appropriating several hundred thousand dollars was tacked on to it for the purpose of constructing a Red Cross memorial. I am heartily in sympathy with the intention and purpose of the Congress to provide an appropriate home for the Red Cross Association, but I am not able to see or to understand how it can be SHAFROTH at the present time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me—

Mr. SMOOT. I can explain that to the Senator if he will yield to me a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; perhaps I accompany my question with too much in the way of a statement.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason that the item referred to is an emergency matter at this time is that there are certain donations to be given to the Red Cross by men in this country who are very aged indeed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. One proposed donation is as much as $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. In one case it is more than $100,000.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator misunderstands my question. I concede that it is an emergency; but the Senator stated that this was an urgent deficiency bill, and I can not reconcile the position—

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to that I will call attention to the fact that the title of the bill is "A bill making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes."

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, the Senator has reference to the time for which the appropriations are made.

Mr. SMOOT. I also recognize the fact that there never has been a deficiency bill passed in Congress for years and years in which items have not been put upon it which never should have been.

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. And I simply rose to say that I agree with the House in this particular instance.

Mr. THOMAS. So do I.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that it would be better policy for the Senate and the House to strike out appropriations that do not properly belong to the particular bill of which they are made a part.

Mr. THOMAS. So do I. But the difficulty—and it is a very serious one—is that a number of items always creep into bills of this kind which upon their merits never could secure the sanction of Congress. In other words, these bills are made the vehicles for an immense amount of mislegislation and for misappropriation of money, by which I mean appropriations which upon their merits would not secure the votes of a majority of the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me there?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that your committee did not let anything not properly belonging to the bill creep into it. This amendment was turned down by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. It was, however, put upon the bill on the floor of the Senate, as the Senate had a right to do, although in so doing it did not follow the recommendations of the committee. Then the matter went over to the House, and the bill was sent to conference. There was a disagreement between the conferees on the ground that the amendment had no right to be on this bill, and yet when the matter was taken before the House that body stood by the action of the Senate, so that the incorporation of this provision in the bill is the action of the lawmaking body and not of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. My criticism is not directed against the committee at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. But it is against that practice of logrolling, which has become a custom that ought to be "more honored in the breach than the observance," under and by means of which urgent deficiency bills and other bills which have a title reciting the purpose—I might say an ostensible purpose—for which they are introduced are repeatedly made general appropriation bills and bills embodying general legislation; in fact, in some instances it is impossible to determine by the title of a bill what it is about, and you are apt to find everything in the bill except something covered properly by the title.

While I am on my feet I want to call attention to another matter that is extremely emergent, which the House did not see fit to legislate upon favorably and which ought to go into this bill. The last general Indian appropriation act contains an appropriation of $50,000, the purpose of which is to enable the Indian Bureau to ascertain the heirs of certain deceased Indian allottees pursuant to the act of June 25, 1910. That is one of the most important subjects, Mr. President, in which the Indian Bureau should immediately interest itself. I am informed that somewhere in the neighborhood of $60,000,000 worth of property is involved in the investigation. The Indian Bureau is prepared to go ahead with this work immediately, but it asks for an allotment of $10,000 of the $50,000, and requests that it be made immediately available for this purpose. The Senate was willing that it should be done, but the House has not given its consent thereto. There is an emergency that is most exigent, and one which, if emergencies are to be the test of the contents of this bill, certainly appeals to me with as much, if not more, force than anything else the bill ought to contain, but which is outside and beyond it. The commissioner informs me that with this money he can easily put his force at work and begin the investigation of the titles to these properties, which as every day passes become more and more difficult and obscure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the conferees on the part of the Senate of course insisted on the Senate amendments. The House conferees said it would be only a short time before what is known as the legislative appropriation bill would come up, and all these matters could be put on that bill. In other words, we must have some system. Representatives of the Land Office, the Treasury Department, and every other department of the Government came before the committee and asked for appropriations to carry out certain things, for the employment of more men to do this and to do that. We had to say to them, "Your estimates will be made on the 1st of December for all of these things. There is a legislative appropriation bill, there is a sundry civil appropriation bill, and there are half a dozen other appropriation bills. These matters can wait two or three months. Do not let us crowd these things into this bill. If we put on this bill matters for the Indian Office, we will have to put on matters for the Land Office, for the Department of Justice, for the Treasury Department, and so on. Let each department come and make its estimates at the regular time and let us have some system about this matter. Great appropriation bills, carrying millions of dollars, will be considered here in December, and that is the time to do it."

There is something in that. Surely these departments can wait a few months. In other words, we appropriated here in July millions of dollars for all of these departments. They really have no deficiency. If they can not do the work with the amount they have, they will come forward with a deficiency later on. Only three months of the year have gone by.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree that there should be some system in these appropriation bills, but what I am complaining of is that there is no system. Emergencies and deficiencies seem to be intermingled; some emergencies are recognized, and other emergencies are excluded. There is a great deal more necessity for the immediate availability of this appropriation for the examination of the titles of Indian allottees than there can be for a memorial building. The same argument applies to the one that applies to the other.

If the Senate would cut out all of these emergencies and confine this bill to its appropriate purpose and legislate only with reference to deficiencies, then, of course, there would be not only some system but a rule of common sense, which would have the added virtue of excluding a vast number of appropriations that have no merit in themselves. If emergencies are going to be considered, however, I wish to urge that this is an emergency upon which the Senate should insist when the conference report comes up for final approval or rejection.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am advised that the matter which has just been described by the Senator from Colorado is an emergency of the very greatest gravity. I am informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the sum of $150,000 has been appropriated heretofore for field work in these Indian heirship cases and the examination of titles and the insignificant sum of $10,000 for office work has been stricken out. If we can not have some office force to keep up with the field work, there is absolutely no use in expending the $150,000 for field work. It is a monstrosity, an absurdity, to go ahead and expend the sum of $150,000 for field work and have no money for the office end of it, to keep track and make a record of what the men are doing in the field.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that last July we appropriated all the money asked for by the department.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; but not by this administration.

Mr. OVERMAN. This administration comes in, after we have given the department the amount of the estimate, and says there is an emergency here, three months after we have appropriated millions of dollars for this department. Here is a new administration coming to us before we are ready for an appropriation bill and asking for $120,000 in an urgent deficiency bill.

It does not look right for these men to come in here asking for these appropriations at this time. This is not the time for it. If they are Democrats, I say they have come at an inopportune time.

Mr. MYERS. But does not everybody make mistakes at times, and are not mistakes likely to occur in these estimates?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not talking about mistakes. It has been only three months since we passed the great legislative appropriation bill. The estimates were made up by the heads of the departments, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President, and we passed the appropriation bill three months ago and gave them what they wanted. Six months from now we are to have another great appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. In the meantime, when only three months have gone by, here comes a department asking for $120,000 more. This is not the time to make the appropriation.

I did not want to say that, but I am forced to do it. They come here and ask for these great appropriations in the meantime, when we shall be making appropriations regularly only a few months hence.

Mr. MYERS. Notwithstanding all that, Mr. President, I insist that this $10,000 is of very great importance to the Western States, and that it is a matter of emergency and urgency and deficiency.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know how much we gave these people in the last appropriation bill, just a few months ago?

Mr. MYERS. For clerical work?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Three hundred and ten thousand dollars.

Mr. MYERS. Well, it takes some money to run the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. We gave them every dollar they asked for. We will have an estimate for more money on the 1st of next July, and in the meantime they want $120,000 after the lapse of three months. Why, Mr. President, we can not stand for that.

Mr. MYERS. They need some more now.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have all the clerical force they asked for. I do not think they ought to come in here at this time and ask for these great appropriations.

Mr. MYERS. If the committee can not stand for it, I appeal to the Senate to stand for it. I believe there is merit in it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question for information. I do not understand that the officials of the department are asking for any appropriation at all. I understand they are asking that $10,000 of the total sum which has been appropriated for the purpose of determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees may be set aside for office help, to keep the office at work. They are simply asking for $10,000 out of the appropriation already made, according to my understanding.

Mr. OVERMAN. We gave them $310,000 in the last appropriation bill for clerical force in this department.

Mr. LANE. Not for this particular line of work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; for clerks in that department and all of these departments. It was a lump appropriation. They can use that $310,000. I will say to the Senator that only three months of this fiscal year have gone by. If the head of this department has a deficiency and has not enough money, he can come and ask for it in the next deficiency bill. We will have another deficiency bill before long.

Senators will understand that we have appropriated $310,000 for this office, beginning with the 1st of July. July, August, and September have gone by, and part of October; and they have a total of $310,000. Suppose they have not enough money. Along in the spring we will have another deficiency bill, and the head of the department can come in at that time if he is behind and ask for more money.

I think the trouble is that these new officers who are coming in do not exactly understand that they have only run for three months of the fiscal year; and while they want more money, and perhaps need more money, this is not the time to get it and not the place to get it.

Mr. LANE. I understand that; but I should like to say, for the Senator's information, that my understanding is that they are not asking for one cent—not a penny. All they are asking for is the authority to use $10,000 of this money for carrying on the clerical work of the office. In other words, you provide them with plenty of money, but do not give them the power to expend it in a way in which they need to expend it.

Mr. OVERMAN. In response to demands from the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who was very urgent about this, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], the Senate agreed to it; but we can not make the House of Representatives agree to it, and they will not agree to it for the very reason I have stated. If the Senate now insists on it, the House will never agree to it.

Mr. MYERS. I am informed that the House Committee on Appropriations are willing to agree to it now if we will only give them an opportunity.

Mr. OVERMAN. Willing to do it, when the conferees on the part of the Senate have been contending and contesting with them all the time?

Mr. MYERS. They want another chance, I understand.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, they had a chance on Saturday. That was the time when they disagreed to the Senate amendment. The Senate conferees insisted on it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the statement I made was intended to correct the impression that the officials of the department were asking for additional money, when, as I understand the facts, they are asking for permission to use money already appropriated in a manner which is necessary in order properly to expend the appropriation. I simply wished to make that statement.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, without criticizing the conferees, because I have no doubt they did the best they could, I wish to say that the Senator from Oregon is correct. This is not an additional appropriation. After the Indian appropriation bill passed, providing for some service with reference to determining these heirships, it was thought necessary, and I think it was, that the office should be permitted to use this particular amount for this purpose out of the $50,000 appropriated by the Indian appropriation bill.

The Senator from Oregon is right, although I do not share in any reflections upon the conferees. I have no doubt, of course, that they did all they could.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that is correct; but it seems to me the only object of the amendment is to authorize the employment of eight additional clerks at $1,200 a year. In the Indian appropriation bill we made an appropriation of $50,000 for field service; and at the end of the year we will find, perhaps, an additional amount asked for in the next urgent deficiency bill. I think the House is perfectly right in not agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think that reflection on the office should be permitted to stand unchallenged. We made additional work for the department in the Indian bill; and it was understood then that we would try to secure for the office, out of the $50,000 appropriated for field work, pay for these clerks whose work would have to be done in the office instead of in the field. The department, I think, was perfectly justified in making the request.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to cast any reflection on the department.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I know that.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do wish to say that wherever temporary clerks have been put in a department, and a special act has been passed appropriating money for those particular temporary clerks, my experience has been that they thereafter remain in the department.

Mr. CLAPP. That may be; but instead of all the work we imposed being field work, part of it had to be office work; and it involved additional labor and the necessity for some additional clerks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator understands about these matters. These officials asked for $50,000 for field work. We gave it to them.

Mr. CLAPP. I know we did.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, three months after that they say, "We want 12 more clerks up here, and we want to take the money to pay them out of this $50,000 for a temporary purpose."

What are they going to do with that amount of money? They wanted it for field work—to do work out in the field. We gave it to them, and they will come back next time, the Senator understands, with a deficiency, saying that that $50,000 was used in the office. If the Senator were on the Appropriations Committee, he would understand this—and he does. He has been on many committees.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am not finding fault with the conferees, but I do think we have fallen into the habit of criticizing the departments too readily. The $50,000 was appropriated for field work and could not be used for clerk hire in the office. We required certain work to be done in the office, and it was the suggestion of the committee that payment for it be made out of the $50,000. It was part of the same general purpose of settling these heirships, but it could not be taken out of the $50,000 without specific authority. The department was justified in asking for it under the circumstances.

That is all I am discussing. I expressly disclaimed any criticism upon the conferees in this matter, because there is no question that they did the best they could.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the Senate amendments.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like a separate vote on those amendments. No. 8, I believe, is the first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 8.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to be heard on that.

According to the amendment as it appears on page 2 of the bill, amendment No. 8 as adopted by the Senate provides:

That hereafter any deputy collector of internal revenue or deputy marshal who may be required by law or existing regulations to execute a bond to the collector of internal revenue or United States marshal to secure faithful performance of official duty may be appointed by the said collector or marshal, who may require such bond without regard to the provisions of an act of Congress entitled—

and so forth.

That is changed by this proposed House amendment so as to make it much more comprehensive. The words "existing regulations" are stricken out, and in place thereof the words "or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal" are inserted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator the number of the line he refers to, and just what the change is in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BURTON. It is in line 21, page 2. As it appeared when adopted by the Senate, wherever a bond was required for a deputy in a United States marshal's office, or in the office of a collector of internal revenue, by existing regulations—

Mr. NORRIS. What is the language that is stricken out by the House amendment?

Mr. BURTON. The words "or existing regulations."

Mr. NORRIS. Is that the only change that is made?

Mr. BURTON. And in lieu thereof these words are substituted:

Or by authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal.

Mr. NORRIS. Where does the Senator get those words?

Mr. BURTON. They are found on page 6181 of the Record, in the discussion for Friday, in the second column.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I was hunting for.

Mr. BURTON. That is, whether or not a bond is required by existing regulations or by law, the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal may order that a bond shall be given. That is, he can make a regulation, he can make a law, applicable to this appointment where none now exists; and in covert form what was already too sweeping, and what was already a violation of the letter and spirit of the civil-service law, is rendered much broader.

I wish to call attention to another feature of this report. When this amendment was proposed here, it was argued most strenuously that it was in order because it reduced expenses. I am unable to accept the ruling of the Chair upon that matter as in accordance with parliamentary law, but it has been made. It has been twice made—in the Committee of the Whole and in the Senate. I trust, however, that it will not be adopted as a precedent in the future.

But let us see. It was said that this amendment was in order because it reduced the amount in line 14 from $30,000 to $25,000, the amount in line 17 from $9,000 to $4,000, and the amount in line 17 from $39,000 to $29,000. It was asserted with great earnestness that there would be a saving of $20,000, and that was the plausible excuse for so vital a change in the law. But how does this come back to us from the conference committee? With every one of those amendments nonconcurring in. The $25,000 is restored to $30,000; the $4,000 to $9,000; the $29,000 to $39,000; so that which was made the reason for this amendment has disappeared entirely. I suppose we could not say the reason for the amendment having failed the amendment itself fails. It has gone too far for that.

But, Mr. President, I am decidedly opposed to this amendment. I shall ask for a ye-a-and-nay vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio demands the yeas and nays on the motion to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I ask if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. Unless he appears and votes, as I am paired with that Senator, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANDELL's name was called). I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANDELL]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], and on that account I withhold my vote, unless I find that my vote is necessary to constitute a quorum.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I understand that he is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I will state that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent from the Senate on account of business and that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is absent on account of important business. I will let those statements stand for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], but am at liberty to vote to make a quorum. I vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). When my name was called I voted, forgetful of the fact that my pair, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], is absent from the city. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I had arranged a transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and I voted without mentioning it. I desire to announce that transfer now, and will let my vote stand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to state that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. Before he left he sent for me and authorized me to vote whenever I saw fit, especially on this appropriation bill, he being a member of the committee and one of the conferees.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. WALSH. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Understanding that a quorum has not voted, under my agreement with my pair, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], I believe I am justified in voting, for the purpose of making a quorum. I vote "yea."

The result was announced, yeas 31, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Ashurst	James	Reed	Thomas
Bacon	Lewis	Shafroth	Thompson

So the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 was concurred in.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate concur in amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before that motion is put I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina what was done with amendments 62 and 63, on page 37 of the Senate print?

Mr. OVERMAN. The House receded and those amendments have been concurred in in the report.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina that as I read the amendments a good deal of confusion is likely to result, particularly from amendment No. 63. The provision as it came from the House was that "the venue of any suit hereafter brought to enforce, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in the judicial district"—

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not understand what the Senator is reading from. Is he reading from page 3763 of the RECORD?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am reading from the Senate print of the bill, page 37.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is reading beginning in line 13?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Beginning in line 13.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator pleases, these amendments, I think, were recommended by the Attorney General, and we put them on in the Senate and the House agreed to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not prepared to discuss the question as to whether the House provision was wise or whether it should not have been amended as evidently it was intended to be amended, but I think that amendment No. 63 is quite likely to introduce an element of confusion into the matter. Let me finish the reading of the provision from the House, continuing at the point where I was interrupted:

Where some or all of the transportation covered by the order has either its origin or destination, except that where the order does not relate to transportation, the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises.

That is understandable, at any rate, and it is enforceable, at any rate. But the Senate introduced, after the word "transportation," the words "or is not made upon the petition of any party," so that in all cases where the order is not made upon the petition of any party the exception which was introduced by the House, "except that where the order does not relate to transportation," does not apply. In other words, where the order is not made upon the petition of any party, but relates to transportation, the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises.

Now, a matter relating to transportation may arise in more than one district. For example, articles being transported from Omaha to San Francisco are in transportation through several States, therefore through several Federal judicial districts, and that particular matter will not arise in any particular district, but will arise in several districts; and when you have that kind of a case you have one that will not come within the provision of your law. I do not know whether I make the matter clear or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is clear about that, and I think probably there ought to be an amendment, but it is now too late to do anything, because we have agreed to the conference report. That is settled, as far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. CLAPP. But we can reconsider the vote.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. WALSH. It does not occur to me that the provision needs any further amendment. In any case, the provision to which our attention is now directed by the Senator was in the bill when it came from the House. The Senate acceded to that provision of the bill and added a provision of its own. No question has ever been raised up to the present time touching the feature of the bill to which the Senator from Utah adverts, and it would seem as though the time had quite gone by when any amendment to the bill affecting that particular clause could be properly considered.

I desire to say in this connection, however, it does not occur to me that any difficulty at all will arise under circumstances such as are mentioned by the Senator. If, indeed, the subject does arise in two or three different States, obviously the venue will be in any one of the States in which the proceeding may be begun; that is to say, if the matter does not relate to transportation or "is not made upon the petition of any party," and it should arise in the States of Utah, Wyoming, and Nebraska, for instance, it seems to me the venue could be laid in any one of those three States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not at all certain that that is so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. The original House provision, beginning in line 15, reads:

Shall be in the judicial district where some or all of the transportation covered by the order has either its origin or destination—showing that the House evidently considered that it was necessary, if it was desired to put the venue in any one of several districts, to say so, because they say, "where some or all of the transportation covered" had its origin.

The element of confusion, as I understand it, is introduced by the Senate amendment, which alters the sense of the original House provision, and with that amendment it provides, in substance, that in some cases which relate to transportation the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition arose.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah in explanation of the Senate amendment, because my recollection is he was not here at the time, that it was suggested upon the consideration that under the provision of the bill as it came from the other House the carrier, who under all ordinary circumstances would be the party who would appeal to the court for relief from any order that was made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, would have an option to lay the venue either in the State in which the transportation originated or in the State in which it terminated, notwithstanding the petitioners would be confined to only the one State; in other words, it was not intended to give an option to the carrier to select the venue as his own interests might seem to dictate, but to fix it definitely in the place where was the residence of the petitioners who gave rise to the proceedings in the first place.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not care to pursue that matter further; it has probably passed beyond the stage where we can help it, but I—

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah leaves that subject, I think he ought to call attention also to the confusion which is involved in the statement of the class of actions, being those which do not relate to transportation, and cases that do not come up on the petition of any party. Then the language fixes the venue of that class of cases by reference to a matter complained of in the petition before the commission.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was just going to call attention to that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The matter complained of in the petition before the commission is described as that in which there is no petition.

Furthermore, I make this further suggestion: It seems to me if there is any possibility of revising the form of this provision, it ought to be borne in mind. The language goes on to add another class:

And except that where the order does not relate either to transportation or to a matter so complained of before the commission—

That is exactly the same class that was described in the previous phrase where the number "63" occurs—where the order does not relate to transportation or is not made upon the petition of any party.

That is the same class of cases. Then it goes on to say:

And except that where the order does not relate either to transportation or to a matter so complained of—

That is, upon the petition of the party—

the matter covered by the order shall be deemed to arise in the district where one of the petitioners in court has either its principal office or its principal operating office.

The language is absolutely conflicting and almost impossible of construction so as to be consistent or coherent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was about to call attention to the very thing of which the Senator from Washington has spoken. The whole trouble arises from the introduction by the Senate of the amendment. If the Senate had let the House amendment alone, the trouble could not have arisen. The Senate amendment is:

Or is not made upon the petition of any party—

Having already provided substantively with reference to cases which do not arise upon any petition at all, then it is provided that—the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises.

It is an absolute contradiction in terms. Provision is first made for a case in which there is no petition at all, and then the venue is to be tested by a petition which does not exist.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think the Senator is quite in error about that. It is the petition of a party. Every proceeding is commenced upon petition or it is initiated by the commission itself. Of course there has got to be some kind of a proceeding; some kind of a basis for it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How can there be a petition without a party to the petition?

Mr. WALSH. Because the Interstate Commerce Commission itself may institute proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then it is not made on petition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not on petition, certainly. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not petition itself.

Mr. WALSH. The word "petition" there, I apprehend, does not necessarily imply a prayer, because the term, as the Senator from Utah well knows, is frequently used to signify the declaration of complaint on original proceedings in any cause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If a matter comes before a commission or before a court upon a motion of the body itself, certainly that matter does not arise by petition; it is a matter that is brought up on the motion of the court or by the commission. When we speak of a petition, we necessarily imply the petition of somebody, and that somebody is a party. Then we provide that in cases of that kind, which do not arise upon petition, the petition, which does not exist, shall govern the matter of venue.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there is no question upon this. It is already agreed to. I move—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether it would be possible to reconsider the vote by which amendment numbered 63 was agreed to?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; because the matter has been in conference; it has been agreed to by the House of Representatives, and it is out of our hands. This can be corrected by future legislation if there is any trouble about it, but it can not be now corrected here. It has passed beyond that stage. The language was not put in the bill on the floor of the Senate, but it came from the other body.

Mr. CLAPP. While it may be better to let the matter go, to be subsequently corrected, I would not want to sit in the Chamber and be estopped by a declaration that a motion for the adoption of a conference report is no less subject to reconsideration in this body than any other motion, though I quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina that perhaps, in view of the situation, it is better to let this go now and correct it by subsequent legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, while there is some little confusion in the language, I do not think there will be any trouble in the proper court taking jurisdiction. I do not believe, as a matter of practice, in the interpretation of this law and its enforcement that there can be any difficulty about the court taking jurisdiction and placing the venue in the place where the matter arose. Although it was not supported by a petition, the court would not be deterred by the inaccurate use of that language without explanation to forego a jurisdiction manifestly intended to be vested in it.

My own judgment is that it will not lead to any serious disturbance in the administration of this law; but, granted, we are really consuming time unnecessarily. It is impossible for us to correct this matter now. If this bill were to go back to conference we would be confronted with difficulties. I have no idea that there is a quorum of the House of Representatives in the city of Washington, and it would be absolutely futile for us to throw this bill back into conference unless we intend to indefinitely postpone it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Virginia this question: He thinks it is a matter that would be easily taken care of. The language of the provision now is that where the order "is not made upon the petition of any party the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. That is the test of jurisdiction or of venue. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose that an order is made hereafter not upon the petition of any party, where is the venue of that order?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It will be held where the cause of action arose under it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no; it does not say so.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think that is the way the court would interpret it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Where does the Senator find that provision?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is, if the court treated the language "in the petition" as having been obliterated, as having no intelligent application to the case, they would place the venue where the cause of action arose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But this is an exception, and it must be tested by its own provision. That exception is that where the order "is not made upon the petition of any party the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition"—which does not exist—"before the commission arises."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My interpretation of the provision, that when the order does not relate to transportation or is not made upon the petition of any party the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises, is that they will treat it as if the words "complained of in the petition" were omitted from the statute entirely.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The court would treat it in fixing the venue as if those words were omitted from the statute, because they can not be controlling, they can not be pertinent, when no petition has been filed. Therefore the court would treat those words as omitted and fix the venue in the place where the matter complained of arose. I do not believe that there will be the slightest difficulty in the way of the court in giving an interpretation that would fix the jurisdiction exactly as the statute intended it to be fixed. It is a little—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In one moment I will yield to the Senator.

It is a little inaccurately expressed; there is a little confusion in the language; I can not undertake to gainsay that; but I believe it is a confusion for which the courts would readily find relief.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Washington that I was occupying the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Utah will allow me, before the Senator from Virginia takes his seat I will say that I know courts frequently do relieve statutes of patent inconsistencies by disregarding certain words which have no meaning when the statute can not be construed without such action. The sentence which the Senator has read, it is true, might be so construed; but how would the Senator relieve the embarrassment which comes up in the next phrase, which not only includes a word which is without meaning but states an exactly opposite and contrary venue? The phrase which the Senator has just discussed fixes the venue in the district where the matter arises, if we leave out the words which the Senator says a court will leave out. The next one fixes it in the same class of cases upon an entirely different rule, namely, in the district "where one of the petitioners in court has either its principal office or its principal operating office"—an exactly opposite rule in the same class of cases. The fact of the case is, there is no occasion at all to have that clause in the statute. It merely repeats a statement of the same class of cases and provides a different venue for them. I would state, merely by way of suggestion, for there is apparently no way of correcting it now, that the provision would be cleared up if you would strike out entirely the words "complained of in the petition before the commission," and then strike out further, beginning with the word "and," in line 23, the remainder of that line, all of lines 24 and 25, and lines 1 and 2 on page 38, down to the word "office," and including that word in line 3 on page 38. With those words stricken out the provision would be complete and would be perfectly clear.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The trouble is that the bill is not in the stage—

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me to complete my sentence—that would cover every possible case. In the first place, in those cases which arise upon petition the venue would be in the district in which the petitioner resided upon whose petition the order was made, and in those cases which do not relate to transportation and are not brought upon petition the venue would be where the cause of action arises.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] as to what might be called the ambiguous or unfortunate use of the words referred to, but I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] as to the manner in which the court would construe the provision. The provision reads:

Or is not made upon the petition of any party, the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises.

The words "in the petition" are, of course, in a sense merely explanatory of the complaint. There might not be a technical petition, and yet in contemplation of law there would be a petition in whatever form a matter arose before the commission, and it seems to me that the court would not have very much difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that what Congress intended in its unfortunate use perhaps of the language was that the venue should rest where the subject matter complained of arose. I think that would be the construction of it.

Now, as to the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I do not exactly catch his suggestion, but the provision goes on to say:

And except that where the order does not relate either to transportation or to a matter so complained of before the commission—

If it arose out of a proposition covered by neither one of those expressions, then—the matter covered by the order shall be deemed to arise in the district where one of the petitioners in court has either its principal office or its operating office.

Does not the Senator from Washington think that that covers a venue which is not covered by the other propositions at all, because one of the others relates alone to transportation and the other to the matter complained of; but when neither matter is covered; that is to say, where the matter before the commission relates neither to transportation nor the matter complained of, the venue shall be at the principal place of business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems to me that it describes the same class of cases described in the clause immediately preceding. I do not see how a matter could be complained of before the commission unless it is complained of by petition, and in all that class of cases where complaint is made by petition and where it relates to transportation the venue is stated in amendment No. 62. Where it is not complained of by petition and does not relate to transportation the venue is stated in amendment 63. They cover all cases, but a third venue is stated for the same class of cases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to add just a word with respect to this discussion. The significance of the language is to be determined in connection with the proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Those proceedings belong to two classes. One class are proceedings that are initiated upon the petition of a party; the other class are proceedings that are initiated by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. The language was intended to cover the venue of both of those classes.

The first provision covers the cases in proceedings initiated upon the petition of a party in relation to transportation, while the other is intended to cover the cases in proceedings initiated by the commission itself and not brought by any party at all. When the commission itself initiates proceedings it does so upon some foundation, some charge, some writing. That may not be properly denominated by the word "petition," but no one doubts what the significance of the word there is. Exactly the same difficulty would arise if you should cut out the words "of the petition" and should say that "the venue shall be where the matter complained of arose," but inasmuch as no one has filed any technical complaint you might say that the matter is not complained of. Of course if you give an exceeding technical meaning to the language there could be no complaint without a party who is complaining, and yet the word "petition" is frequently used—and used in many of the code States—simply to designate the initial pleading upon which proceedings are instituted, and that is undoubtedly what it means here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it may be that the courts will come to relieve this situation and straighten out this matter. As has been said by the chairman of the committee, the matter has passed the point where this body can do anything about it; but I can not let the matter be finally disposed of without saying that it is a piece of exceedingly loose legislation. It is so unhappily worded and there is so much confusion in it that a responsible legislative body like the Senate of the United States ought to be ashamed to let it go upon the statute books.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that if he feels that way about it it is his duty as a Member of the Senate to introduce a resolution to correct it. It can be done in that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, May I ask the Senator from North Carolina whether amendment No. 61 has passed beyond consideration here?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. Does the Senator wish to know what has been done with that amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to know.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House agreed to the Senate amendment introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which struck out those lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it has really gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Absolutely.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to some inaptness in that amendment. I read:

Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the tenure of any of the judges now acting as circuit judges by appointment under the terms of said act.

These judges are not acting as circuit judges. They are circuit judges, and were so appointed definitely by authority of the statute.

Again, it says:

But such judges shall continue to act under assignment, as in the said act provided, as judges of the district courts.

They are not assigned to act as judges of the district courts. The statute says that they—

Shall hold office during good behavior, and from time to time shall be designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for service in the district court of any district, or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I will suggest that while that is true, they not having been assigned to any of the circuit courts at the time when we abolished the Commerce Court, leaving them with no active duties except those connected with the Commerce Court, is it not appropriate to speak of them as now being assigned by this legislation, or making provision for their being assigned by this legislation, to duty in the district courts? If the Commerce Court were to be continued, of course, then the language of the original law would determine under what circumstances the judges would be assigned to duty in the district courts; but the law being changed and the Commerce Court being abolished before they have been so assigned, it seems to me it is entirely proper that this language should be used in the law for the purpose of indicating that while they have not been assigned as contemplated by the original law, being situated as they are, provision is now made for their direct assignment.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the very thing of which I complain. I think the present bill ought to provide for their disposition in the future; but, unfortunately, it simply provides for their disposition in the manner provided in the original law. The original act does not contemplate their assignment as district judges, although it does contemplate their assignment for certain services in the district courts.

I am calling this matter to the attention of the Senator from North Carolina, not to embarrass or delay the consideration of the report; but to me it is obvious that if we intend to keep these five judges—or four judges, rather; I am not sure about this. I was about to say that whoever drew this amendment overlooked the fact that we had abolished the office of one of them, at least. I do not remember whether the House passed the bill in which that was done or not. But whether that be so or not, we ought to make definite disposition of these judges in a law to control the future, now that the Commerce Court has been abolished, and ought not to refer to the disposition which the original law made of the judges, under the direction of the Chief Justice.

I had it in mind also to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the second line on page 38. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] have developed what they regard as inadequacies in that section. Whether they be right or not, however, the use of the words "where one of the petitioners in court has either its principal office or its principal operating office" can not properly describe the situation. There are no petitioners in court in such cases until a suit is brought, and it is the venue of the suit to be brought which is intended to be provided for in this bill.

I can not close without expressing my regret that I happened not to be present when this part of the bill was considered by the Senate, and I am very sorry that the House had an opportunity to recede from its original proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House, I think, intended to copy very nearly the language of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the original appropriation bill. Whether this was covered in the bill or not, I am sorry the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Iowa were not here when the bill was considered, as I am sure if they had been they would have pointed out the inconsistency. I hope it may be corrected in the future by a resolution or by a bill.

I now move that the Senate concur in amendment No. 107, which is with regard to the Red Cross building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OWEN in the chair). As amended by the House?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate agree to amendment No. 107, as amended by the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does that mean that the Senate recedes from the amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the Senate concurs in the House amendment. The House concurred in the Senate amendment, but added these words, making the chairman of the Committee on the Library, who is the chairman of the joint committee, a member of the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to let that amendment be passed over for a few minutes? I am informed that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] desires to speak for just a few moments on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I make the motion, en bloc, that the Senate recede from its amendments Nos. 10, 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 82, 93, and 97. They contain the Angelo Albano and Mexican claims, the appropriation for mints and assay offices, the memorial bridge, the automobile for the Vice President, and the extra month's pay to the employees of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Before that is done I should like some information from the Senator from North Carolina concerning the appropriation for mints and assay offices, and what the attitude of the House was with respect to the matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. In regard to that, the conferees on the part of the Senate would not yield. They insisted on the Senate amendments, knowing how the Senator from Montana and other Senators felt about them. The House conferees said: "Then we will take the matter to the floor of the House." They took it to the floor of the House, and the House refused to agree to the Senate amendments. The House conferees called our attention to this fact, however. I do not think the Senator from Montana was here last year at the time there was a great question before the Senate as to whether or not we would abolish these mints absolutely. The House had repeatedly voted to do it. The Senate refused to agree to it. The question was whether or not we would pass the great appropriation bill. We had it in conference here for a week, and all night long one night, and we made a compromise about 3 o'clock in the morning. The compromise was that we should do away with some 34 policemen, cut in two the contingent expenses of the mints, and the mints should stand. That was agreed to.

The House conferees called our attention to the compromise that was made about four months ago. We told them how insistent the Members from the West were in favor of these mints, but they would not yield. They referred the matter back to the House, and the House stood by its original position.

This question will come up again in the next appropriation bill, doubtless, and whenever it does come up the House of Representatives evidently will insist upon the abolition of these mints. They have done it two times, I think, if not three different times. The Senate has refused to yield. On this matter, which is only in reference to the contingent expenses of the mints for the next six months, I hope Senators will agree to yield their opposition upon those amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion to recede is agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senate recedes from its amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina was that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 82, 93, and 97.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, I call up amendment numbered 107.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand, the only modification in this respect is that the chairman of the House Committee on the Library is added to the commission which has the duty of approving the plans and site of the building?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think there is any objection to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to Senate amendment 107.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate concur in amendment No. 107, as amended?

Mr. OVERMAN. The House has agreed to amendment 107, which was a Senate amendment with an amendment. Now the question is whether we shall concur in the House amendment. I move that we concur.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is concurred in, and the conference report is agreed to.

SENATOR TILLMAN'S RETROSPECT OF 18 YEARS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the RECORD of October 7 I find that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two cartoons designated "Senator TILLMAN's allegorical cows." Those were allowed to be printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent of the Senate, nobody objecting. Therefore, of course, I have nothing more to say further than that if I had been present I should have objected to those cartoons going into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that has been reconsidered, and they will not go into the permanent RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. They will not go into the permanent RECORD? The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter is to be printed as a document.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any objection whatever to its being printed as a public document; but I did want to make my position clear, not only to the Senate, but to every member of the Joint Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the matter is to be printed as a public document and is not to appear in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will be content with what I have already said.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock meridian on Thursday.

The motion was agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 191) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. The drainage area east of La Grange on the Tuolumne River, Cal.
2. The run-off from said drainage area by years or seasons and for such a period of time as the records will permit.
3. The total area of land irrigable or that can be irrigated from this river and for which the waters of the Tuolumne River and tributaries can be put to beneficial use.
4. The quantities of waters that can be stored in feasible reservoir sites on the river and its tributary streams.
5. The quantities of water that it is deemed advisable to store for beneficial use of the lands properly irrigable from said stream or tributaries.
6. The drainage area and run-off of such part of said total drainage area as may then be available as a water supply for incorporated cities and towns, the capacities of feasible reservoir sites within said area after provision is made for beneficial use of the lands properly irrigable from these sources, and the quantity of water per day in gallons that would be available as a water supply for such incorporated cities and towns.
7. That he be directed to furnish the same information for the Stanislaus River east of Knights Ferry;
8. For the Mokelumne River east of Clemente; and
9. For the Consumne River east of Michigan Bar.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A request has been made by the Senator from Idaho for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho consider an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to suggest, as an amendment, that the information called for in the resolution include a separate statement of the amount of flow in the Eleanor and Cherry tributaries, which, with the Hetch Hetchy, make the Tuolumne River, and that it include a statement of the amount of power that is capable of being developed in each one of those three streams, stated separately. The importance of this, it seems to me, is that the Eleanor and Cherry tributaries of the Tuolumne are outside of the national park, while the Hetch Hetchy, one of the three constituent parts of the proposed project, is in the park.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment if the Senator will state it so that the Secretary can take it down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the proposed amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will state it. I propose to add, at the close of the resolution, the following:

That the statement include a separate statement of the average annual flow of water in the Cherry, Lake Eleanor, and Hetch Hetchy tributaries of the Tuolumne, and a separate statement of the amount of hydroelectric power capable of being developed in each one of these three tributaries of the Tuolumne.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Idaho if the Senator from Washington is through.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am through. I understand that the Senator from Idaho accepts the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the amendment in so far as I can do so.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted and I did not hear the reading of the resolution. I wish the Senator from Idaho would be kind enough to state the substance of it.

Mr. BORAH. The object of the resolution is to get the amount of annual flow and the run-off in the different streams which may be involved in the discussion of the Hetch Hetchy matter when it comes up the 1st of December. It asks the Secretary of the Interior to make a report upon the different physical facts which will throw light upon that question. I do not think it is a thing that anyone could object to, as it is solely for the purpose of acquiring information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Now, I ask, if no one desires to make a suggestion, for the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have it read as it has been amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed resolution as amended.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 191) as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. The drainage area east of La Grange on the Tuolumne River, Cal.
2. The run-off from said drainage area by years or seasons and for such a period of time as the records will permit.
3. The total area of land irrigable or that can be irrigated from this river and for which the waters of the Tuolumne River and tributaries can be put to beneficial use.
4. The quantities of waters that can be stored in feasible reservoir sites on the river and its tributary streams.
5. The quantities of water that it is deemed advisable to store for beneficial use of the lands properly irrigable from said stream or tributaries.
6. The drainage area and run-off of such part of said total drainage area as may then be available as a water supply for incorporated cities and towns; the capacities of feasible reservoir sites within said area, after provision is made for beneficial use of the lands properly irrigable from these sources; and the quantity of water per day in gallons that would be available as a water supply for such incorporated cities and towns.
7. That he be directed to furnish the same information for the Stanislaus River east of Knights Ferry;
8. For the Mokelumne River east of Clemente; and
9. For the Consumne River east of Michigan Bar.
10. That the statement include a separate statement of the average annual flow of water in the Cherry, Lake Eleanor, and Hetch Hetchy tributaries of the Tuolumne, and a separate statement of the amount of hydroelectric power capable of being developed in each one of these three tributaries of the Tuolumne.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, obviously what I am going to say will not be pertinent to this subject, but—

Mr. BORAH. Could we not have the resolution disposed of first? I understand there is no objection to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a moment ago a motion was made and carried that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Thursday next. I am a new Senator here, and would be presumptuous if I attempted to put my limited experience into the scales against the experience of elder Senators. But I warn the Senate, I warn especially the Democratic Members of the Senate, that no party can fool the American people. Let us either manfully work or manfully adjourn.

I protest with all the vehemence of which I am capable against trying to make the American people believe that we are at work when we are not. On the calendar there are 40 or 50 bills that have been reported. They should be passed or defeated. Is the United States Senate afraid to meet the bills that are upon the calendar? Is any Senator afraid to vote yea or nay on the bills?

We are drawing salaries paid to us for performing our duties, and I again protest, and shall continue to protest, against a procedure of pretending to be at work when we are not. Now, why may we not meet at 2 o'clock every afternoon and take up the calendar? Many bills of great importance to the country are pending on that calendar requiring attention. There is an enormous work and an immense responsibility just ahead of the Democratic Party. The serious economic conditions facing us require that we give studious, assiduous, and careful attention to legislation in addition to the tariff and the currency.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as a usual rule I concur in pretty nearly everything that the Senator from Arizona puts forth in the Senate, but I must say I can not concur with him in resisting the motion to adjourn over until Thursday. Unquestionably the Democratic Party is pledged to the enactment of a currency bill. That bill is now being considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. Every time we take an adjournment for only a day the members of that committee desire to attend the session of the Senate and it retards the operation of the committee in the hearings as well as it will retard it in the consideration of the bill. It is a very important measure. We are trying to expedite it in every way that we can, and each one of these sessions from day to day, instead of an adjournment for three days at a time, is bound to make a delay in the ultimate consideration and determination by the Senate of the bill. It being considered one of the great bills, it being absolutely necessary that it should be considered by the Senate, it seems to me that an adjournment for three days at a time is a proper course for the Senate to take.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state his point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Have we finished the morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I call for the unanimous-consent agreement, under which the Senate agreed to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 192) to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections. I will say that I am in hearty accord with what the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has said, and I would like now to proceed to the consideration of this legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was agreed by unanimous consent to take up the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Minnesota has simply to ask the Chair to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The regular order I understand is to lay the bill to which the Senator from Minnesota refers before the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 192) to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Hollis	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Lane	Page	Smoot
Brady	McCumber	Poindexter	Sutherland
Bryan	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Thomas
Burton	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Thompson
Chamberlain	Myers	Sheppard	Tillman
Clapp	Nelson	Shields	Vardaman
Cummins	Norris	Simmons	Walsh
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If in order, I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to adjourn has already been made and must be first passed upon.

Mr. CLAPP. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the roll of absentees be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BRISTOW and Mr. THORNTON answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absentees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms is instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. CUMMINS. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. KENYON], I desire to announce that he is detained from the Senate by illness in his family.

Mr. CLAPP. If it were not for the fact that we have already had a quorum here this morning, I would not have asked for this order, but in view of the fact that the RECORD shows we have had a quorum I think it is only fair that we should send for absentees.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I would be very reluctant to see the Senate adjourn, but I knew that more than a majority of Senators were away or were leaving the city. When the roll was called this morning many Senators came to me and stated that they were going away. I had the greatest difficulty by personal appeal in keeping Senators here until we disposed of the deficiency appropriation bill, and a number told me that immediately after that they were going to leave. I believe there is barely a quorum in the city now, and that is the reason why I moved an adjournment. The motion was not made on account of any hostility to the bill, but owing to the circumstances.

Mr. LEWIS, Mr. STONE, Mr. REED, and Mr. STERLING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent on important business, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. WEEKS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with. The bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole. The committee have reported certain amendments, which will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was, in section 1, on page 1, line 6, after the word "send," to insert "or to furnish to be sent or transmitted, or to carry or cause to be sent or carried," so as to read:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, or any officer or agent of any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, to send or to furnish to be sent or transmitted, or to carry or cause to be sent or carried, any money or other thing of value from any State or Territory of the United States to any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee in any other State or Territory of the United States, including the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the proceedings just a moment, because I find it necessary to go to a committee meeting.

I have been engaged, as the other members of the Banking and Currency Committee have been engaged, constantly upon the bill now pending before that committee. The committee has been proceeding as rapidly as it could. It has been the hope, I think, of all Members of Congress that the bill should be reported as soon as a proper consideration could be had, and that when reported it might be promptly considered by the Senate.

I have said that I have been absent from the Senate much of the time because of service upon that committee. If I had not been working on the committee, I would have been in my seat in the Senate and would not have occasion to make the statement I am about to make or to complain of what has transpired.

Mr. President, I find that we have now a unanimous-consent agreement, entered into on October 9, to consider Senate bill 192, to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections; we have another unanimous-consent agreement, entered into on the same date, to consider the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine; there is another unanimous-consent agreement to consider the bill (H. R. 7207) granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way, which agreement provides that the bill shall be voted on before adjournment on the calendar day of Saturday, December 6; and there is a further unanimous-consent agreement providing for the consideration on December 8 of the bill (S. 48) to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in Alaska.

Mr. President, I do not know just how soon the Banking and Currency Committee can report the bill now before it. That it will report it at the earliest possible day is, in my opinion, without question. I am simply expressing my individual opinion, but it is an opinion based upon the attitude of the members of the committee. When the bill comes before the Senate it will be the most important bill we have had before us since my membership here, at least; and, as I have said, it ought to receive prompt and careful consideration. If we continue to enter into unanimous-consent agreements fixing arbitrary dates for the consideration of various measures, when that bill does arrive in the Senate the legislative road will be so obstructed by unanimous-consent agreements that delay in the consideration and passage of the currency bill will be inevitable, the degree of delay depending, of course, upon the number of unanimous-consent agreements entered into and depending upon the length of the debate which may ensue.

For my part, if I were to be permitted to sit here in the Senate, instead of being upon the Banking and Currency Committee, I would refuse to give unanimous consent unless it were a matter to be then and there acted upon and disposed of. I am now calling the attention of Senators who want to see banking and currency legislation enacted within a reasonable time to the fact that unanimous-consent agreements are likely to prevent prompt consideration and passage of that bill or any other important bill which may come before us, and I am taking this opportunity to suggest that we ought not to grant unanimous consent further. As I have stated, if I could be here on the floor I would myself make the objection.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague a question. The unanimous-consent agreements to which my colleague refers, at least the two more important ones, as I understand, have reference to dates in December—one to December 1 and the other to December 8—at the next regular session. There is a unanimous-consent agreement affecting the bill which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is now seeking to bring before the Senate. I should think there would be no obstacle in the way of bringing that up, if the Senate cares to take it up on its merits, so far as banking and currency legislation goes, if I judge correctly as to the likelihood of getting that legislation before the Senate. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri when the Senate can probably expect the currency bill to be reported, and, in this view, do the unanimous-consent agreements for the next session, in the opinion of the Senator, stand in the way of currency legislation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can best answer that question by simply stating the facts—and, mark you, I do not profess to be speaking for the committee; I can only give my own opinion as a member of the committee. The hearings, by resolution of the committee, are to be terminated on the 25th of this month. There is constantly a greater demand for hearings, and there are awaiting the committee to-day probably 25 or 30 men who desire to be heard. The committee in fixing the date of October 25 thought they were fixing as short a time for hearings as was proper. When those hearings are terminated, of course, the committee will immediately take the bill up for consideration. That there will be many amendments offered in the committee I think I can say without challenge—I mean by that that my statement to that effect will go without challenge. In order to discuss and to dispose of those amendments the committee must have a reasonable amount of time. I can not tell how long or how short that time will be and, therefore, I can not say when the committee will be able to report; but I can say that it will report with all diligence, as it will work to the extent of the physical ability of its members in order to accomplish a result.

I am constrained to speak in this conservative way, Mr. President, because this bill involves the entire currency system of the United States and it involves to a greater or less extent the entire banking system of the United States. Every man who has given a question of that kind a moment's serious reflection and consideration knows that haste is the highest sort of unwisdom and that because of the serious nature of the questions involved, care and thought ought to be given; but at the same time because of the weighty nature of the propositions and their importance to the country prompt action and consideration should be had; by all of which I mean to say that just as the question is important, it ought to be gravely considered, and just as it is important it ought to be promptly considered and acted upon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like, if he will permit me, to make one suggestion to the Senator from Missouri while he is on his feet. I will occupy only a moment. I agree with the Senator very heartily in what he has said as to the gravity and importance of the problem to be solved, but I should like to have him state while he is on his feet, since it has been suggested that probably some effort has been made in the committee by certain Senators to delay action, whether or not there is any foundation for that statement?

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, I have not seen the slightest manifestation on the part of any Senator on the committee of a desire to delay this bill one moment. I almost regret that the question was asked, and I almost regret that it is necessary to answer that kind of a question; but I know the Senator asked it because there has been some criticism—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Some intimation that that was true.

Mr. REED. In the public press to that effect.

Mr. President, there are possibly in this world some men wise enough to know just how to frame a great bill that will work perfectly when it is applied to the banking and currency system of the United States, but unfortunately the members of this committee, being all human beings and possessed of ordinary fallibility, judgment, and limitations of knowledge, find it necessary to make some inquiries and to endeavor to learn something about the subject with which they are dealing. Therefore the members have asked every man appearing before the committee such questions as were suggested, and I can say for my own part, speaking only in reference to my individual limitations, that there has not been a man who has appeared before the committee who has not given me some light I did not theretofore possess.

I believe the members of the committee will be able to agree upon a bill regardless of party alignment. I have seen no disposition manifested to draw party lines on this bill. It has seemed to me that every member of the committee has been doing the best he can do.

Now, Mr. President, once and for all with reference to this question of delay, I will say that the tariff bill reached the Senate on the 9th day of May. It passed the Senate on the 9th day of September, and finally became a law on October 3. It was held in conference for a longer time than the currency bill has been before the committee, and yet the tariff is a question that has been discussed ever since most of us can remember. The two parties had adopted their respective policies, and when the election was held and the Democrats were returned to power it was known that a certain policy was to be followed, and all that was necessary was to fit a schedule to a known and determined policy; and yet, acting with great diligence and care, with great industry and labor, it took us all that time to write a tariff bill. Now, here is a bill that went to the Committee on Banking and Currency on the 18th day of September. It has been before the committee a total now, I think, of 23 days, including Sundays. It has never been a party measure; it is not bottomed upon a party policy; it is a great scheme of banking and currency to apply to the entire country; it is a measure upon which our Republican friends have never taken a position, so far as this particular bill is concerned, and upon which our party has never committed itself. It is a matter in which, if we make a serious mistake, we will involve the commerce, the industries, and the currency of the United States. It is a question of such character that, if we act upon it wisely and prudently, we can probably bring great benefit to the commerce and industry of the people of the United States. But only those who are possessed of superhuman wisdom can act with safety in regard to a measure of that kind without considering it and giving the different parts of the country an opportunity to be heard. I believe the committee will speedily submit a report on the bill to the Senate, considering the character and nature of the bill. All I rose to say was that I hope when the bill is reported the legislative highway will not be so blocked by unanimous-consent agreements with reference to other legislation as to make it impossible to pass the bill within a reasonable time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri I think the members of the Banking and Currency Committee have a right to expect their colleagues here to keep the way open for them. I agree with him that we should not block the road by unanimous-consent arrangements, so as to prevent the Senate from giving its entire time to the banking and currency bill when it shall be reported. We do not know how soon the bill will be before us; we do not know how long it will take for us to discuss and perfect it when it is here. It was for that reason this morning I objected even to a request for unanimous consent by which the time of the Senate early in January was to be set aside for a measure suggested by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. President, we are also entitled to the time between now and the report of the committee for all Senators to study the currency bill and for the committee to do its work satisfactorily. It should not be subject constantly to calls for the lack of a quorum to come here to the Senate to attend our sessions. We break up the work of the committee by our sessions now. I think every Senator is entitled to his time to study this measure. We should give the currency bill all of our time until it is passed.

We have been in session a long while. Had I not found a consent order setting a measure for next Thursday, I should have moved this morning a joint resolution to adjourn or to take a recess until some time in November, the earliest time when the Committee on Banking and Currency might advise that their report would be ready. But the consent order has been given at our last session for the seamen's bill to come up next Thursday, and for that reason I made no effort for a recess.

I have been carefully examining these consent orders, and I am gratified to find that those for December are not very much in our way. The first is a consent order simply to begin the consideration of a measure. Having begun it, the Senate can dispose of it at once. It does not require us to continue the consideration of the measure until we vote upon it. The other consent order for December requires us to begin the consideration of the measure, and requires us to vote upon it at a certain time, but does not require us to continue to consider the measure until we dispose of it.

Therefore I do not think those consent orders for December, unless they are amended, will seriously hinder the work of the Senate, and if any effort is made to perfect them by unanimous consent I hope objection will be made.

Mr. President, I hope we will so shape our work as to give our time to the banking and currency bill until we act upon it in the Senate, and allow nothing to be placed in the way to hinder as careful consideration of the question and as speedy action as possible.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the inquiry addressed by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as to when the Banking and Currency Committee will probably make its report leads me to call attention to a feature of the situation about which there is manifestly much confusion in the public as well as in the legislative mind.

Bankers and business men from all sections of the country have applied to the Senate committee for an opportunity to present their views regarding this universally recognized great problem confronting the American people. It has been said from time to time that they have had ample opportunity to present their views elsewhere. The fact is that the Banking and Currency Committee in the House that reported this bill never had a public hearing and never examined a single witness.

It is true that during a part of the session of the Sixty-second Congress the then existing Banking and Currency Committee did hear certain witnesses. As a matter of fact, they devoted 50 hours during the year preceding the 4th of March, 1913, to an examination bearing more or less remotely upon probable banking and currency legislation. Of the 21 members of the committee that participated in those hearings in the Sixty-second Congress, however, only 3 were members of the Banking and Currency Committee in the Sixty-third Congress that reported this bill to the House. Therefore, of the 21 members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House at the present time only 3 have had the opportunity of hearing business men and bankers regarding necessary changes in our banking system. But unless witnesses may have been examined before the Democratic members alone—and of that I am in doubt—I do know that no witness was called at any time or given an opportunity to be heard by the committee that stood sponsor for this bill in the other branch of Congress.

I can well understand the surprise that must be felt throughout the country when it is seriously questioned as to whether business men and citizens and bankers intensely interested in a great piece of legislation shall or shall not be accorded the privilege, which ought to be the right of every American citizen, of coming before their Representatives in Congress and pointing out where they think a structure that is about to be erected is weak or faulty, when if it be weak or faulty it will carry in its train a mischief such as this generation has never experienced.

There is no subject upon which the thought of Congress can be concentrated that so vitally affects the happiness, the prosperity, and the well-being of the entire country as the subject of banking and currency. At times I can scarcely believe my ears or trust my eyes when I hear and read suggestions that this important piece of legislation should be passed at once, be the consequences to the American people what they will.

Mr. President, the members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate have a high sense of the responsibility under which they rest in considering the legislation now before them. To their colleagues, if it be necessary, the assurance can be given that they will discharge that responsibility and perform that duty as their own consciences and their own intellects tell them it should be performed for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York now when he thinks the Committee on Banking and Currency will likely report this measure?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I regret that I can not answer the question, perhaps, as satisfactorily as the Senator would like to have it answered. I will tell him, as his colleague told him, that when the committee reports a bill it will have exhausted all necessary deliberation and consideration of the subject. Some minds move more quickly than others. Some members of the committee can perhaps report a bill or come to a conclusion with regard to vital points in this measure quicker than other members.

Mr. STONE. All that is true; but the question I ask is what the Senator thinks as to when the bill will be reported.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will say this: On the 25th of October the hearings will close.

Mr. STONE. Yes; so I see.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I did not know that the Senator was aware of that. He has been absent for some time, while we have been taking care of these hearings.

Mr. STONE. I read that in the newspapers.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The members of the committee will then attempt to take up the present bill section by section, with the hope that as a result of the joint deliberation of the members a measure will be framed free from the defects, the blemishes, and the deficiencies which are apparent upon this bill, although in certain places it has been regarded as the last word on banking and currency legislation. It is possible that toward the end of November the committee may agree upon a bill.

Mr. STONE. "Possible"—"toward the end of November"?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator think the committee will be better prepared to evolve the matter of which he speaks a month hence than it is now?

Mr. O'GORMAN. We have heard from bankers and business men from the State of Missouri. I rather think some other business men from that State may want to be heard; and, as the Senator's colleague assured him, I have listened to no witness before the committee without deriving benefit from the views expressed. Therefore I have some hope and expectation—

Mr. STONE. I wish to say—

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will permit me to conclude—

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That every day from now up to the 25th of October will contribute something to the fund of knowledge and learning upon the subject now possessed by members of the committee.

Mr. STONE. Between now and the 25th of October is it the purpose of this honorable committee, which has great labors upon it, I know, and great responsibilities, to attempt the work of considering the bill itself and the amendment of it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No.

Mr. STONE. Does the committee intend to wait until it is through with all the hearings?

Mr. O'GORMAN. We intend to devote all our time in the interval to hearing the views of witnesses. We can not do two things at one time.

Mr. STONE. Oh, but you can do two things running along parallel lines. When we had the tariff bill up we had hearings, and we also considered the bill in the committee. The two things ran along somewhat together.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Of course the Senator knows there are a great many citizens who say they had no hearing before the Finance Committee.

Mr. STONE. Oh, yes; there are a great many who said they did not, and there were a vast number who indicated that they wished to be heard. If we had heard every man who wished to be heard, we would be having hearings now. What I desire to impress upon the committee is that I have been from the beginning, and am now, unqualifiedly and unconditionally in favor of the consideration and disposition of currency legislation at this extra session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator is not exceptional in that attitude. I think it is true of all the Senators.

Mr. STONE. I do not think I am exceptional in it. I will go further than that and call the attention of the honorable Senator particularly to the fact that his colleagues on this side of the Chamber have formally expressed themselves, by a resolution, in favor of the consideration and disposition of banking and currency legislation at this session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to correct the faulty memory of the Senator from Missouri. The only action taken by the Democratic caucus was that they favored the consideration of banking and currency legislation at this session.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is receiving consideration.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The caucus did not seek to impose upon the committee the necessity of concluding its labors—

Mr. STONE. I will not undertake to join issue with the Senator without reference to the resolution itself. My remembrance, however, is that the resolution provided that banking and currency legislation should be considered and disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The language was "determined," I think.

Mr. STONE. That it should be considered and determined at this session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I again assure the Senator that the word "determined" was not used in the resolution.

Mr. STONE. But if only the word "considered" was used in the resolution, I say it was the sense of the Democrats of this body that it should be considered at this session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is being considered, and has been considered, while many Members—

Mr. STONE. Of course it is being considered in committee; but—

Mr. O'GORMAN. I insist upon being permitted to conclude. It has been considered during this session, and has been considered by the members of the committee, while certain Senators who now see light and are manifesting extraordinary interest in the legislation have been away from Washington, not giving their time as required of committee members.

Mr. STONE. I assume the Senator means that as a reflection upon me.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; it reflects on nobody, but it is intended to relate to those to whom it can be truly applied.

Mr. STONE. It does apply to me. I have been away for more than two weeks. The Senator knows why I have been away, and it is hardly a kindly reference to my absence. If I had been in my seat every day, however, I would have had no opportunity to consider this bill in the legislative sense. I am trying now to ascertain in as gentle and kindly a way as I can when I may have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am afraid the Senator is assuming too great a labor on the first day of his return to the active work of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Too great a labor to ascertain a fact from a member of the committee?

Mr. O'GORMAN. In trying to ascertain a specific date.

Mr. STONE. That is a strange remark for the Senator to make. I did return to-day, and I ask the Senator for information, and he says I am assuming too great a labor on the first day of my return. I am sorry the Senator leaves the matter at that point. It was not controversy that I sought; far from it. I sought information, with the hope that I would learn that we would have this measure before the Senate at an early date, when we might take it up and consider it in the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am simply giving the Senator the information that was in substance given to him a few minutes since by his colleague.

Mr. STONE. My colleague expressed, as he said emphatically, his personal opinion. Now I turn from him to the Senator from New York to ask him his opinion.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator has received it.

Mr. STONE. I do not know what it is.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I said that some time in November there will be a report from the committee, perhaps.

Mr. STONE. "Perhaps."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when I rose to suggest that in order to expedite this business unanimous-consent agreements should not be made, that it would be unfortunate if they were made, and that when the banking and currency bill came before us we should find its way obstructed by these agreements, I had no thought of provoking a discussion in regard to the bill or the time of the report.

My colleague asked me the same question that he has asked the Senator from New York. I only in part answered it, stating that the hearings would end on the 25th of October, and that the committee would then immediately try to work out the details of the bill. I might have said, as I now say, that it seems to me as one member of the committee, that 10 or 12 days will be necessarily consumed in that work; but that is only my own individual opinion.

It is conceded now that there must be some amendments. I mean, it is conceded in the committee. I do not know what the opinions of my colleagues on the committee are, except as they are reflected in occasional remarks or by questions; but judging from those remarks I think there is a coming together of the minds of the members of the committee with reference to certain vital propositions in the bill. That being the case, and knowing that there are many things to consider, I think it will take that long, and I believe we shall be able to get a report. Possibly every member of the committee will not agree—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, then the Senator from Missouri does not agree with the Senator from New York that it will take 30 days in the committee, after the hearings are closed, before the committee will be ready to report to the Senate?

Mr. REED. I did not so understand the Senator from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator said the hearings would close on the 25th of October, and that toward the end of November, perhaps, the committee would be ready to report to the Senate.

Mr. REED. I am giving my judgment, and it is a little different from that construction of the statement of the Senator from New York, if he intended it in that way. I think in 8 or 10 days we ought to come to an agreement, or to find that we can not agree, and then have certain members come to an agreement, but I may be mistaken. I know that we shall gain time by thoroughly considering each matter and endeavoring to thrash it out.

Mr. President, before I leave my feet I want to say, in reference to my colleague's absence, that I know why he left the Senate, and some other men here know why he left it. He would not say, but I say, that most serious illness in his family called him away, and that his devotion to public duty kept him here for a good many days when I know his heart called him elsewhere.

With reference to the suggestion my colleague made, that we might be considering the bill while the hearings are going on, I will say that the hearings have not been sporadic and occasional. They have begun at 10 o'clock in the morning, and they have run through the day until 5 or half past 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening. That is about the limit of what a man can do.

I wish to say in conclusion—for I certainly did not rise to my feet in order to start a discussion—that under ordinary and normal conditions, if we were running as we ordinarily do, no one would think of asking the committee to report in haste. Everyone would rather gladly welcome the fact that the committee was trying to find out what it ought to do. I make the prediction that every day spent in the committee will save 10 days' discussion and battle upon the floor of the Senate. Perhaps that is an overstatement, but I think I am perfectly safe in saying that it will save much time on the floor of the Senate.

I know something of this body, although not, perhaps, as much as the older Members. I know that the Senate of the United States will not railroad a banking and currency bill; and if it should do so it would abdicate the high place it has held in the councils of this Nation.

So, Mr. President, I renew my suggestion as to the unwisdom of making unanimous-consent agreements now that will block the consideration by the Senate of the banking and currency bill when the committee is able to report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks that have just been made by the Senator from Missouri, I desire to say that I am in hearty accord with his views as to these unanimous-consent agreements. First, I do not think it is a good policy to have unanimous-consent agreements when there is a bare quorum, or perhaps less than a quorum, of the Senate present.

I have no objection to any of the agreements that have been made, so far as I am concerned. If I had been present, I would not have objected, because I am perfectly willing to take up any of these measures at the time that has been agreed upon. But since the Senate and the country are interested in currency legislation, since the committee of the Senate is devoting its attention to that measure, I think, as industriously as any committee of the Senate has ever worked on any great bill, these meetings of the Senate, where there is a continuous struggle for a quorum, necessarily break into the deliberations of the committee. To-day the larger part of the day has been interfered with, so that our work has been delayed because of our necessary attendance here in order to maintain a quorum.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Aside from the mere call of a quorum there has not been a moment of the time of the committee taken up on the subject matter of the call of a quorum. The entire time of those who are members of the committee has been taken during the consideration of this bill upon the question of the meetings and hearings of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to refresh the Senator's recollection. We had a vote on an important bill that was pending here, and it took every vote that could be secured in order to get a constitutional majority.

Mr. CLAPP. That was before the pending bill came up, and I think before there was a call for a quorum this morning the first call of the Senate was a call on a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. The fact remains.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question for my own information.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to be settled that the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency will be closed on the 25th. I should like the Senator to give me his judgment as to how much longer time will be consumed in the committee after the hearings are closed before he thinks the committee will be ready to report. The Senator from Missouri seems to think 8 or 10 days, and the Senator from New York about 30.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is difficult to give any satisfactory answer, because there is a divergence of views on the part of the members of the committee as to what provisions should be incorporated in the bill and what changes should be made. These differences of opinion are quite marked. They are not along party lines, I will say. They come from the conviction and judgment of the individual members of the committee as to what is the best thing to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, and I hope—

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, I will undertake to answer his question as nearly as can be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that condition of things will continue to exist.

Mr. BRISTOW. As to how long it will take the committee to weigh the testimony which has been taken and to deliberate upon the various amendments that are to be offered is a rather difficult thing to approximate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, it is; but I should think that the committee, having heard the testimony, ought not to have to spend a great amount of time either reading it or weighing it. I know the membership of that committee so well, their intellect so well, that I know they are weighing testimony as they go along. It struck me that perhaps if they would get right down to work, to vote upon every amendment would require not over four days, at any rate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can say to the Senator that that will be utterly impossible. If we undertake to report the bill out in four days after the hearings are closed, the committee would be recreant to its duty and unworthy of the high responsibility placed upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should think that they could consider the various amendments in that length of time. They understand already what they are. They have heard the testimony and they have weighed the subject matter. For myself, knowing each one of them intimately, I think they would have formed their opinion by the time the testimony closes.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Kansas yields.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. What subcommittee of the Committee on Finance was the Senator on when dealing with the tariff bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was on the subcommittee dealing with three schedules of the dutiable list, and the income tax and the administrative section and agricultural products.

Mr. REED. How long did the Senator have those matters before the subcommittee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We were fixing most of them as we went along, while we were hearing them, and a very few days after we got through with the hearings we reported back to the main committee; I have forgotten how many days, but I think about five days after the hearings before the subcommittee were closed.

Mr. REED. That is still vague, indefinite, and uncertain—

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is not.

Mr. REED. Because you had hearings from day to day before parts of the committee a part of the time and then you would work; but, as a matter of fact, the committee, taken as a whole, had the tariff bill under consideration from the 9th of May.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After the subcommittees had reported back, of course then the members of the committee who had not an opportunity to hear the testimony before the subcommittees, had to have time to read it. That is not the case with this bill. The full committee is sitting.

Mr. REED. Now the whole committee is sitting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And it is sitting all day, not a part of the day, and it is hearing testimony. Then, after that has been done, various members of the committee will have their suggestions and amendments to bring forward, and each of them will have to be considered and discussed.

As no one knows just what amendments will be offered or what suggestions will be made, and as we are dealing not with schedules but with great principles and then with the application of those principles to a business that ramifies the country and is as varied almost as the products of the country, it is necessary of course to give each of those matters proper consideration. It is not a question of merely voting upon certain amendments. Therefore I say to the Senator—

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator must recognize the fact that it takes a much shorter time to settle the various opinions on general principles than the schedules of a tariff bill.

Mr. REED. That may be true; but I know some people thought it was an utter waste of time to take the length of time taken by the Finance Committee in considering mere schedules. Men who were advised knew that they had a most difficult problem before them, and men who are advised with regard to this matter know the same thing. A bill may be an admirable bill for New York City and a very bad bill for the small banks of the State of Mississippi. It may be an admirable thing for the business men of New York City and yet it may be a very bad thing for the business men of Mississippi or Missouri and—

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. It is not merely a question of settling a general principle. I think the general principles of this bill, speaking in the very broad sense, are acceptable to most of the members of the committee, but when you come to put necessary limitations upon them and safeguard the variations that must be made, you have a problem that is as intricate and as delicate as can be imagined; and I wish, so far as I am concerned, that some greater man than myself—you would perhaps not have to search far to find him—might have my place on this committee, somebody who knew better than I know what ought to be done; but I should not want to see somebody there who less than myself appreciated the gravity of the work we are entering upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, when considering a responsible and important question we always regret our inability to face it with thorough information, and that is a tribute to the Senator's honesty as well as his modesty.

But I did not intend to enter into a debate at all. I wanted, if I could, for my own guidance and the guidance of my own conduct, to find out about how soon we might hope that the bill would be back in the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am sorry that I can not give the Senator from Mississippi the accurate information that he would like to have, but I want to say, in corroboration of what has been said by other members of the committee, that we are working industriously and conscientiously. I never have been a member of a committee that has been working more industriously or more conscientiously on any question than the Committee on Banking and Currency is now working on the present bill. I do not think that legislation as grave and important as this is, which affects the vital interests of every community in the United States and the business fortunes of hundreds and thousands of men, which may result in failure here or failure there if mistakes are made, should be hurried. I think that if the committee does its duty to the Senate and to the country it ought to know from men whose fortunes are involved in the legislation how the provisions of the bill may affect them, not only in one section of the country, but in all sections of the country; and having ascertained that fact as nearly as it can be ascertained, then we should proceed to frame the bill so as to promote the welfare of the country and interfere as little as possible with the normal operations of our business life. With that in view, every member of the committee is working and concentrating his mind upon this great question.

I do not feel that the committee is subject to insinuating criticisms by Members of the Senate. Members of other committees on bills no more important have taken far more time than has been suggested even by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in the consideration of this measure. So I hope that the committee in its effort to work out the best legislation that can be worked out will have the support of the Senate and the aid and help of Members of the Senate in solving this problem, and not captious criticism because, indeed, it seems to them we are not making the progress that might be made if able men were in charge of this responsible work.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it occurs to me that any attempt improperly to hurry the Committee on Banking and Currency would be a most injudicious act.

As has been well said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and other Senators, this is a question of extreme importance, affecting the very lifeblood, the circulating medium of the country. Knowing as I do that every hour which this great committee devotes to the bill is profitable to the Senate and to the country, I feel that no person should, and that no person has attempted to hurry the committee, because to attempt to hurry it, when it is doing all that a committee can do, would be most injudicious and harmful and might result in an illy considered, misshapen law.

A Senator a moment ago reprobated the unanimous-consent agreements. Mr. President, I do not object to the unanimous-consent agreements. I have, and I am somewhat proud of it, had a part in assisting to secure some of these unanimous-consent agreements. I knew that the Banking and Currency Committee could not be hurried and that it ought not to be hurried. That committee will carefully, calmly, and properly consider the great measure which is before it.

The reason why I have been active in trying to promote certain unanimous-consent agreements was because I felt the Banking and Currency Committee would require sufficient time in which to formulate this important measure and that the balance of the Senate ought to be equally as assiduously at work. Here is the Banking and Currency Committee working six days a week and many hours out of each day, and it would well become the remainder of the Senate to devote its attention to some other needful legislation.

That was one of the reasons why I took a small and unimportant but to me a proud part in assisting to secure the unanimous-consent agreement to consider the seamen's bill. It might be appropriate to reflect at this time that while we were attempting to secure unanimous consent to consider the seamen's bill, the same being a bill which has for one of its purposes the safety of human life and the reducing of the number of accidents to ships at sea, the Volturro was on fire, and hundreds of human lives were placed in a perilous position. A calamity was occurring on the high seas to this vessel, and doubtless some lives were lost because seamen were not properly trained in the art or the method of lowering lifeboats.

So I repeat, knowing the Banking and Currency Committee was diligently at work; knowing that no Senators could more earnestly desire to promote the public weal than that committee; knowing that its chairman, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], is one of the ablest, most learned, and conscientious men in American public life, I justify my activity in attempting to consider other business upon the hypothesis that while that committee was at work the balance of the Senate, the eighty-odd Senators, might proceed to other matters upon the calendar.

In conclusion, I must not be understood by my attitude in trying to promote other needful legislation as in any way attempting, directly or indirectly, to hurry the Banking and Currency Committee. Least of all was it my intention to interpose other business or block and impede the progress of the currency bill when it reached the Senate. I venture the assertion that no Senator thought of interposing other legislation in order to block or impede the progress of the currency bill, but many Senators believed that while that committee was at work the remainder of the Senate should not stand idly by.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I feel like this was about as good a time as any other to take up a few minutes of the Senate to express a few and perhaps unnecessary remarks.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield for a moment? While the Senator is on his feet, inasmuch as the bill under consideration has not been referred to yet, possibly the Senator will also include that in the observations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will; thank you.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have some little discussion of that bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a preface to the consideration of the bill I wish to say that I hope we have not reached a time when it will be regarded as beneath the dignity of any Senator of the United States to be hastened in the great work of the people. I do not say "to be hurried," because "hurrying" is a word involving the idea of confusion and of leaving work not perfected behind it. But I certainly hope that the Banking and Currency Committee will not consider it beneath the dignity of the committee or of any individual member of it to regard the wishes and demands of some ninety-odd million people as a reason for hastening in their work.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator submit to an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to state to the Senator that members of the Banking and Currency Committee are now detained on the floor by reason of this discussion. We had a meeting scheduled for half past 3 to listen to a delegation of witnesses who were to appear at that time. We would like to be released from presence here for the purpose of attending that meeting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; and I understand also the purpose of the interruption. But prior to the interruption itself the time of the Senate had been taken up explaining why the members of the committee could not be hastened, and so I thought I would suggest the idea that it was not beneath a Senator's dignity to be hastened and not beneath the dignity of a committee to be hastened. The idea of wanting to get through as soon as possible with a great work for which 90,000,000 people are waiting is not and should not be offensive to anybody who is charged with the responsibility and labor in that connection. I do not believe that there is a member of the committee who will so regard it when he looks at it from a reasonable standpoint.

Now, with regard to these unanimous-consent agreements, I was perfectly willing to see unanimous consent given for the consideration of the seamen's bill. That is a bill involving life and death. It involves more than that; it involves the health of sailors on board, the prevention of the overcrowding of the crew, and giving enough cubic feet of atmosphere for a man to breathe and to keep in good health. It is as emergent as almost anything else. It does not cover as broad a scope of ground as the tariff and the currency bills, but within the scope that it does cover its emergency is much more intense.

But with regard to unanimous-consent agreements generally, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is mistaken when he thinks that no unanimous consent entered into by the Senate will be later on used for the purpose of blocking the currency bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Nebraska has made no observation to that effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHurst]. I beg the Senators' pardon. I was looking at the right Senator, but named the wrong one. There are people in the United States very bitterly opposed to any reformation of the banking and currency laws in this country in the interest of the people. There are people who represent an invisible board of control whose mastership and domination are being threatened by a visible board of control, to be put in control of the issues of currency in this country and the general conduct of its currency business. If the Senator from Arizona thinks there will be nobody here at that time to take advantage of the fact that unanimous consent has been given in order to keep the ball rolling and keep the banking and currency bill off this floor, then he has reached a state of optimism about the United States Senate not justified by its past history. So much for that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It is the purpose then, I understand, of the majority that no business shall be transacted of any moment except the unanimous-consent agreements which have already been had until the currency bill comes in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not say that. My purpose is to have nothing that can block the way after the currency bill comes in to keep it from having full and complete and sufficient consideration and an early vote. If when Senators ask for a unanimous-consent agreement they will couple it with the condition that the privileges of the bill shall cease to exist when the banking and currency bill is entitled to the floor, I shall have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Are we going to transact any other business between now and the time when the currency bill comes in? May we expect to take up the calendar and dispose of bills which are here, or is it the desire of the majority that those matters shall be postponed? I ask the question for the reason that there are measures here in which we of the West are greatly concerned, and if measures are going to be taken up and considered we would like to get ready to urge those. On the other hand, I am perfectly willing, if I know it to be the policy of the majority, to abide by their judgment until the currency bill does come in. But what are we going to do in the meantime?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could add nothing to what has been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and other Senators upon the floor to this effect, that every day spent in session here is a day subtracted from the work of the Banking and Currency Committee in thrashing out as far as possible the differences there in order that those differences might not have to be thrashed out here later on.

Mr. BORAH. That is all right if that is understood to be the policy. If it is understood that we are not to transact business here, but that we are to give the committee and the Senate the time from now until the 25th to work on this matter, perhaps not very many will object to it, but we have no such understanding. We proceed from day to day, and when we come here we take up matters unexpectedly and consider them. The committee is called out to its work and there is no system of order or procedure marked out in advance at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The criticism of the Senator from Idaho is in the main part just, yet there is no way I know of upon the days when the Senate does meet to keep one Senator from talking, or another Senator from calling up a bill on the calendar, or another Senator from proceeding to the measure already agreed by unanimous consent to be considered.

Now, I come to the main business of the day, much to the pleasure, I have no doubt, of my friend the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. That depends upon how the Senator lines up on the main business of the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every Senator has to wind up at some time. The Senate itself, composed of many Senators, has been known to wind up business at times.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator misunderstood me; I said "lined up."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he used the term "wind up" in the sense of concluding.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the compound verb has two meanings. At one time you wind up in the sense of concluding, and at another time you wind up in the sense of proceeding to talk; and the Senator is a past grand master in both performances.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield to me, I should like to say a few words on this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly; I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have been one of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency who have wanted to expedite the matter of hearings as much as reasonably could be done, but I can not see much profit to come from this discussion with relation to that subject now, because we have fixed on the 25th day of October for the closing of the hearings, and I do not believe that it is possible to change that order. That being the case, we must look to the future for expediting the measure. I felt that there had been a great deal of testimony taken before in the hearings on financial legislation and that a great many volumes had been issued concerning it, and I thought we could get a great deal of the information that we derive now by reading those reports. I therefore favored early closing of the hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee. But I recognize that is over, and the only question now is to determine what we ought to do here in the way of expediting the legislation after the 25th day of October.

When matters are up for consideration here the members of the Banking and Currency Committee come to hear what is going on in the Senate. In fact, there never has been a meeting of the Senate when the members of the committee have not been here to attend the session of the Senate. If you are continually to have these sessions and if you are continually to consider measures in the Senate, the Banking and Currency Committee can never complete its consideration of the bill unless it holds night sessions.

I am not one of those who believe that we should consider other legislation during this session. Ordinarily a governor of a State will call an extra session of the legislature for the consideration of one, two, or three measures and name them, and nothing can be considered at the legislative session except that which was named by the governor. That same power was intended to be given to the President. When the President calls an extra session of Congress and specifies that there shall be the consideration of certain measures, those measures, it seems to me, in deference to the fact that he has the power to call an extra session or not, must be considered by Congress as the proper course to take during that extra session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Was the currency question included in the call of the President for the special session?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There was no legislation expressed, I understand, in the call of the President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then how does the Senator arrive at the conclusion that the business of the Congress was to be limited?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Because the President delivered two messages, one of which took into consideration the tariff measure and the other took into consideration the currency measure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I know; but the President never has suggested that Congress should not deal with other matters?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Inasmuch as the inclusion of one excludes the other, it seems to me that it was evidently the object and the intention of the Executive that those measures at least should be the principal measures which should be considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the view of the Senator from Colorado is that the Senate ought to wait, before it does anything affirmatively, until the President tells it what to do?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it is not, but when the President is vested with the power alone of calling an extra session and calls it and designates what shall be considered, I think the power ought to be exercised in the same way that legislation is enacted at the direction of a governor when he calls an extra session for the purpose of considering only certain measures.

Mr. LEWIS. Will my friend from Colorado yield to me to respond to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has my consent, which I grant very readily and very graciously.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like the attention of my friend from Utah. The Senator from Utah who has just addressed himself to the Senator from Colorado asked the Senator from Colorado if the President in his call of Congress made any reference to banking and currency legislation, leaving the intimation very clearly that if he had not there was not any duty imposed upon as such as was indicated by the Senator from Colorado.

I desire to say to the learned Senator from Utah that if the Senate is now taking up the question of currency following a call that was limited to the question of the tariff it is pursuing a very respectable precedent. I invite the attention of the learned Senator from Utah to history. In 1897, after the election of 1896, President McKinley convened Congress in special session ostensibly for the object of passing a tariff bill that became known as the Dingley tariff law; and while we were in session in response to what the able President felt was the popular opinion he sent a message to Congress with a view of amending the then banking and currency laws to carry into effect the gold-standard idea which he thought the popular vote at the ballot had expressed. We passed in the lower House of Congress and in this body an amendment, which is now the law, and it was done without the call of President McKinley specially comprehending the question of banking and currency.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me a moment just for a word?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The suggestion which I made to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] was not with a view of insisting that we ought not to take up the currency measure, but it was to obtain the view of the Senator from Colorado upon the suggestion which he had made, that we ought not to take up anything else. The view of the Senator from Colorado seemed to be that the President, having called the Congress originally for the purpose of dealing with the tariff, the Congress ought to devote its time and attention to that subject to the exclusion of everything else; then, the President having sent in another message with reference to the currency question, that we ought to confine our attention to that subject. It seems to me, if Congress is to remain in session, that it ought to do business; that 70 or 75 men ought not to sit here idly in the city of Washington awaiting the action of the Committee on Banking and Currency. We either ought to come together and do whatever business is upon the calendar, sit here day after day and attend to the business of the country, or we ought to adjourn and go home and let the Banking and Currency Committee attend to its duties, and when it is ready to make its report, then the Senate and the House of Representatives can deal with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. SHAFROTH. The attitude of the Senator from Utah would be perfectly justifiable—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado for a moment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator's attitude would be perfectly justifiable if it were not for the fact that the very proceedings that take place in the Senate every day are the proceedings that cause delay upon the part of the Banking and Currency Committee. We can not determine when the consideration of the bill by the committee will close. Therefore we can not say with certainty when there will be a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. This is the same condition identically that follows the calling of every extra session of Congress. When the extra session of 1897 was called by President McKinley, there were three-day adjournments continually from the very beginning until the close of that session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Colorado imagine that his committee will be ready to report before the middle of November?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope so, but I can not say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think that it will be ready to report before the 1st of November?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think it will.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is so, then why does not the Senator endeavor to obtain the permission of the President of the United States for the Senate to take a recess for that length of time?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not one of those who confer with the President much; I am not one of the leaders of this House. I am a new Member, and consequently I see no objection to the adjournment for a reasonable time; but evidently, if we are here and hold these sessions we are going to delay the final report upon this bill, and I am urging that view to expedite the matter so as to get the bill before the Senate at the earliest possible time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is not much advantage about occupying the floor in the Senate except the privilege that it gives of gracefully yielding to interruptions. I therefore always insist that I shall be addressed when I have the floor, so that if my own reasoning and eloquence shall not be projected before the country, the other gentleman shall at least have consent from me for his. Now I yield to the genial Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair also would like occasionally to "get in" on being addressed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the President of the Senate would like to "get in," I would yield to him in a moment, but not right now.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for his yielding to me, and as he says he gladly yields and gracefully yields, I respond that there is no action of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi of any kind that is not graceful, and oftentimes he is as graceful as he is fertile in humor and delightful in expression.

I now desire to say to my distinguished friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that I am one of the Senators to whom he alluded, without possibly having in his mind any particular person. I am one of those who do not regard it wise that the Senate should now take a recess, and I have so expressed myself lately for the following reasons: Could we have had a recess immediately following the passage of the tariff bill, I would have regarded it as prudent.

I think we could then have gone to the country and obtained the views of our constituents upon the banking bill, so that we might have returned here better informed and in every wise better qualified to assume our duties than we now are; but the wisdom of the Senate being to the contrary, at the direction of those who have authority and the right to intimate such, we have now passed the summer; we are now in the fall. The objection I would have now to the Senate taking a recess while the committee is considering the banking and currency bill is because, among other things, of the intimation of the Senator from Mississippi, very correctly stated, that a certain number of gentlemen throughout this Union, who represent an invisible board of control, seem to feel that they can at a distance, by merely hurling anathemas at the United States Senate or the legislative body of this country, frighten it from its duties by either forcing it to surrender its obligations on the one hand, or, on the other, in the discharge of their duties to yield to their particular demands. If these particular gentlemen were content to come before the legislative body and give their views upon a question of which I will admit they are well informed, they would, so far as I am concerned, not only be welcomed—generously welcomed—but their advice received and acted upon in so far as it met the wisdom of a public man in the discharge of his duty under his conscience and under the law; but where they present the attitude to the country of having bullied the Senate, intimidated the body, held us up before the country in execration as lacking wisdom and sense, stating that we are about to do a thing that is disastrous because of lack of knowledge or patriotism, then to take a recess or to permit one at this time would give evidence that we have surrendered to that form of intimidation, that we have been frightened by that set of gentlemen, because they are in great aggregate numbers and represent aggregate strength. Therefore, lest we should give such evidence, I would prefer that we now remain in session and receive the advice of these eminent gentlemen, whosoever they are, from wheresoever they be, and continue our work along the line of our duty as we see it and not now yield, lest we are put in a position of having been forced to abandon a duty that we undertook because of threats of intimidation or of an overshadowing power that is presented by the suggestions of these gentlemen in the different assemblies where they meet. That is my reason why I am one of those who oppose the proposition for a recess at this time.

Now I will yield the floor to the Senator from Mississippi, gladly feeling and gladly admitting that he has some right to occupy it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, any charge previously made against me that I was either hurrying or hastening things has been fully disproven by the course of events; but I need pay no attention to that now. I do confess, however, this morning I was somewhat alarmed by having it said upon the floor of the Senate that after the Senate committee had discontinued its hearings it would take 30 days, with a perhaps—a very strongly emphasized “perhaps” at that—to report back to the Senate a banking and currency bill. I was not very much alarmed because of the banking and currency bill itself, but when I considered the great program before the Democratic Party, with which it must comply or confess itself incompetent, I felt a little bit alarmed about it. I know, and no man knows better, that a great deal of time was unnecessarily consumed in the consideration of the tariff bill. I do not want to say that time was unnecessarily consumed about everything. At the beginning of the next session of Congress we shall have to take up and grapple with the great trust problem of the United States, so called—I say “so called” because nobody knows what a trust is; nobody has ever yet succeeded in defining one, either upon the statute books or otherwise—the great question of semimonopolization of the production of industry. I want everything out of the way by that time.

Mr. President, here comes the originality of my remarks. In order to hasten things as much as possible, I want to get a vote upon Senate bill 192, which is now before the Senate. I think, as a rule, this country has never suffered from too few laws; it has suffered a great deal from too many. I am not in very much sympathy with the idea of letting the Senate do business in the way of passing laws. Except at important times and in connection with important questions, I think the population of the United States would be benefited if Congress did not meet at all; but there must be these emergency questions, and they must be taken care of. This is one of them.

This bill was reported by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] with amendments, and it seems to be a bill that almost anybody in favor of honest and fair politics ought to be in favor of. It merely prohibits the mobilization of capital in a campaign toward a threatened point; it merely prevents the special interests of this country from accumulating a great mass of capital and sending it to a State which may by its electoral vote decide a presidential election or to a congressional district vitally in doubt. The currency bill is to mobilize the credit forces of the country; this bill is to demobilize the corruption forces of the country. It makes what few exceptions there ought to be, to wit, that the provisions of the bill shall not apply to the payment of bills incurred by a National or State campaign committee regularly authorized and meeting under the law, or to collections made and sent to a State or National campaign committee authorized by law and reporting under the law.

One of the best ways of getting the path clear for the consideration of the banking and currency bill when it shall come into the Senate is to dispose of what few unanimous-consent agreements there are now upon the calendar, this being one of them, and very important from the standpoint of political purity—I do not like that word much; it sounds almost like “puritan”; “political honesty” is a very much better expression.

Then there is the seamen's bill to come up, to take care of the lives of the people. I express the hope that we may have as early a vote as possible upon this measure and upon the other measures that are upon the calendar by unanimous consent, not only because they are right in themselves, but because, after they have passed, there will be, for this side of the Chamber at any rate, an opportunity to put its great program into consummation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now; in a moment I will. I want to say something seriously, Mr. President, outside of the drift of the remarks I have made in the last three minutes.

I am one of those men who take their democracy almost as their religion. I believe that the Democratic Party has a great future before it, and I believe that it has the capacity and the integrity to take care of that future. I therefore want to see the pathway cleared for it as much as can be. I think it has given to the country the best tariff bill since the Walker tariff bill was passed in 1846. I think that, upon the whole, so far as its general principles are concerned, the banking and currency bill offered is the best banking and currency bill ever offered to any American Congress at any time in the entire history of the United States. I think that the pending bill is in favor of political honesty, and that is the sort of people's rule I am in favor of—the rule of the unbought people, of the honestly taught people. I have never been demagogue enough to believe that the great mass of mankind alone, by themselves, when bought and influenced and taught wrong, were the wisest rulers in the world. I consider them the best because they are the most honest, because they have no axes to grind, and I would rather have them with their comparative ignorance than to have wiser men who have axes to grind; but I think the way to make the rule of the people right is to make the rule of the people honest; and the way to make the rule of the people honest is to cripple, demobilize, and disorganize those who would corrupt the people and thereby prevent the vote of that part of the people who are willing to be corrupted from counting at the elections. I think it is a very good bill, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of the suggestion that has just been made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and others, that we ought not, until the 25th of October, to transact any business here except that which is already covered by unanimous consent, will not the Senator from Mississippi prefer a request for unanimous consent that the Senate do not transact any other business except those matters which are entered on the calendar?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not do that, because at almost any moment some matter of critical importance might be presented to the Senate. Nobody is wise enough, nobody is prophet enough, nobody is statesman enough to say that for two months in advance we shall not consider any business except something specially indicated; but I shall oppose upon the floor of the Senate any request for unanimous consent for the consideration of any measure, unless I believe it to be of the very highest and most vital importance, and it will have to be of high importance for me to believe that it is vital, with my view of keeping the track clear for the banking and currency bill.

Mr. BORAH. Then, as I understand, we are not to transact any business except that which is already provided for, unless it is such business as appeals to the judgment of the Senator as of exceptional importance?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, the Senator does not mean that. Of course, when I said “I,” I meant you, too. Any Senator has an equal right with me.

Mr. BORAH. I did not mean it exactly the way the Senator took it, but I supposed the Senator was to some extent speaking for his side of the Chamber. In other words, I should like to know whether it is the desire or expectation of the Senator or of the majority side to take up any matters except those exceptionally important matters?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the Senator is in error. A little before the present administration came into power the Senator from Mississippi did have a sort of glimmering, remote—hardly a hope, but a distant dream—that perhaps he might be of some weight or consideration in connection with what took place on this side of the Chamber; but the Senator has long since given up any idea that he had any right to speak for anybody except himself, and he is now speaking only for himself.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the Senator's usual modesty is getting the better of him. If the Senator from Mississippi will say that that will be the program, I shall rely upon that program to be carried out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator wants my judgment upon that question, I think it will be carried out; I think that is what Senators over here think; but that is only my thought concerning their thought and is not their thought.

Mr. BORAH. Well, we seem to have demonstrated the fact that there is no particular program outlined and none to be outlined; that we are to continue along the same line of procedure by incident when it is not by accident.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 192) to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am obliged to leave the Chamber, and I desire to say just a word with reference to the pending bill. The purpose of the bill—at any rate, the principal purpose of the bill—as I understand, is to prevent what I think has been a very great evil in this country, the concentrating of a large amount of money in some particular State or States which were regarded as doubtful. With that purpose I am in entire sympathy. As I understand the bill, I am in entire sympathy with it. I was a member of the committee which considered it and was one of those who agreed to the report of the bill, but there are one or two matters to which I want to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who has charge of the bill. In the first place, it is provided:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, or any officer or agent of any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, to send or to furnish to be sent or transmitted, or to carry or cause to be sent or carried, any money or other thing of value from any State or Territory of the United States to any person, firm, corporation, association—

The act of sending or of carrying is not in any manner characterized. It is made an unlawful thing merely to carry money which is intended to be used for the purposes specified in the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. It is—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In other words, if the Senator will permit me a moment, it might apply to an express company. It would in terms apply to an express company which was perfectly innocent of any intent of doing anything wrong or improper. I suggest to the Senator that in line 6, on the first page of the bill, after the word "committee," we ought to insert the word "knowingly," so as to read, "knowingly to send or to furnish," and so on.

Mr. CLAPP. Personally to that I would have no objection, although I think the language would excuse an express company or the common carrier, for it reads:

To send or to furnish to be sent or transmitted, or to carry or cause to be sent or carried.

However, I have no objection to the word "knowingly" being inserted. I think all laws should be plain, and unless the Senate objects I would have no objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wanted to call attention to that, because, as I have said to the Senator, I am obliged to leave the Chamber, and if the Senator in charge of the bill consents to that I have no doubt it will be incorporated in the measure. Now one other suggestion which I desire to make. The penalty clause provides that any person who violates the act shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 and by imprisonment for not more than one year.

I think in a statute of this character ordinarily it is a very great mistake to provide that imprisonment must be imposed under any and all circumstances. I had something to do with the preparation of the Criminal Code, and we eliminated from almost every offense the provision for minimum punishment, so as to leave the whole matter in the discretion of the court, and we also eliminated from nearly all offenses those provisions which made it incumbent on the court to impose both fine and imprisonment. The reason why that was done was that we received communications from many of the district attorneys throughout the country saying that the provisions of the law respecting minimum punishments very often resulted in juries returning verdicts of not guilty, because they knew in a given case that while the accused ought to submit to some punishment, to a fine, for example, the offense was not grave enough to justify imprisonment even for a single day, which would entail not so much hardship, perhaps, but disgrace.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say, as I had the honor of serving with the Senator on that committee, that I was rather in harmony with that view, as the Senator will remember. Would the Senator object to this: In line 1, on page 3, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or," and then, after the word "year," in line 3, to insert "or both, in the discretion of the court"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no need to say "in the discretion of the court." I suggest to substitute the word "or" for the word "and," and after the word "year" insert "or both." Of course it is in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say to the Senator that of course I do not know what the Senate will do with this matter, but I will offer those three amendments as they are reached in order in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. With those amendments, I can very cheerfully support the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Just a moment. I can not promise the Senator what the Senate will do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand the Senator has only given expression to his own attitude.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah leaves the Chamber I should like to submit a matter for his attention. I have had the honor and pleasure of serving with him on the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for some months, and I have a high respect for his opinion as a lawyer. I address the question also to the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. CLAPP], for I have had no opportunity to confer with him on this point.

I am heartily in favor of this bill. I trust that when it becomes a law, as it ought, it will be an efficacious one, and that men who attempt to violate the law will not be able to escape because of some technicality. Sometimes the Federal courts are extremely technical. The bill, if it becomes a law, denounces the sending of money knowingly or willfully, if the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is adopted, from one State to another for the purpose of influencing the election of a President, Vice President, Senators, and so forth. Should not the words "or presidential electors" be inserted? A man might send openly $50,000 from one State to another for the purpose of influencing certain persons to vote for or against presidential electors, and when indicted for an offense under the statute plead in the Federal court or wait until the evidence against him was offered, and then object thereto on the ground that the statute simply denounces the sending of money for the purpose of electing a "President," and that the money which he sent was for the purpose of influencing the election of "electors"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language of the bill is:

To be used or expended for and on behalf of the nomination or election of a President or Vice President.

I think—

Mr. CLAPP. And the election of electors would be a step toward the election of a President.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the very point I wish to have cleared up. I want no doubt to remain.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that would cover the question of using money for the nomination or election of electors, because, as the Senator from Minnesota has just said, that is a step in that direction.

Mr. ASHURST. The reason why I submit the suggestion is that I introduced a bill in the last Congress which made it unlawful for any person to attempt to intimidate any voter in the matter of selecting a President or Vice President, and I found in my researches that in order to have a law through the meshes of which a guilty man could not escape it was necessary to insert the words "or presidential electors." I submit that for the consideration of the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield a minute, it seems to me directly in line with the suggestion made by the Senator from Arizona the point was made here, and I think the Senator from Utah took a very conspicuous part in the discussion, during the trial of the election case of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. It was contended at that time that spending money for the election of members of the legislature, or in a primary election of members of the legislature, was not equivalent to spending it for the election of a United States Senator within certain statutes, the question being very similar to the one raised by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, we can very easily dispose of the discussion by offering to insert, after the word "States," in line 8, the words "or presidential electors."

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no objection to that; but I should like to reply in just a word to the suggestion just made by the Senator from Washington. The contention in the Stephenson case was made as the Senator has indicated, but I certainly did not participate in that contention. I took exactly the contrary view. I took upon that matter exactly the view I am taking upon this—that it was a step in the direction of electing a United States Senator; and that was the view the committee took. In the investigation of that case we went into all of the proceedings relating to the election of legislators and the primaries which preceded the election, and which had for their purpose the nomination of a Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Utah recollect what position the former Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn] took on that question? My recollection is that he took the position that it was not a violation of a statute against using money for the election of a Senator to use money in the election of members of the legislature.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not recall at this moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not undertake to say that the Senator from Utah took that view, but only that he took part in the discussion. I only mention it to show that lawyers differ upon the subject, and that the point might be raised in the courts, and nobody could tell what view some judge might take of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not remember what position the late Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn] took upon that matter, but I do know that the majority of the committee, at any rate, took the other view. I see no reason, however, why the amendment should not be made.

Mr. CLAPP. No; at the proper time I will offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendments proposed by the committee, which the Secretary will state in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 11, after the word "national," it is proposed to insert the words "or State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 14, after the word "national," at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert "or State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In lines 15 and 16 it is proposed to strike out the words "transportation and hotel" and insert in lieu thereof the word "actual."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "national," in line 16, it is proposed to insert the words "or State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 22, after the word "person," it is proposed to insert: "Acting for himself, or for or in behalf of any firm, corporation, association, or committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the words "be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished" and insert "be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "less than six months nor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 3, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "and any corporation violating any provision of the foregoing section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as I observed the reading by the Secretary, he began on page 2. There seems to be an amendment on page 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to before the discussion on banking and currency began.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "to" where it first occurs in line 6, the word "knowingly."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, after the word "to," it is proposed to insert the word "knowingly," so that it will read "to knowingly send."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In line 8, page 2, after the word "States," I move to amend by inserting the words "or presidential electors."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the word "States" and the comma, it is proposed to insert the words "or presidential electors."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 3, line 1, I move to strike out the word "and" and substitute the word "or."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, in the committee amendment already agreed to, it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. And in line 3, page 3, after the word "year," I move to insert the words "or both."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "year" and the comma, on page 3, line 3, it is proposed to insert the words "or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which the Secretary has before him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 1, line 6, already agreed to—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

The SECRETARY. After the word "transmitted," in line 6, in the proposed amendment of the committee, it is proposed to insert:

Or donate or directly or indirectly give or promise to any other person, firm, or corporation to give any money, or equivalent of any money, which shall be subsequently sent or transmitted.

Mr. ASHURST. Should not that read "provided those gifts are made with the knowledge that they are to be transmitted"?

Mr. CLAPP. The word "knowingly" is already in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in that connection ought not the second infinitive, "to," be omitted in line 6, so that it will read "to knowingly send or furnish to be sent," instead of "to furnish to be sent"?

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BURTON. I think that ought to go out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 6 of the proposed amendment, before the word "furnish," it is proposed to strike out the word "to."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota, for information, the meaning and application of the words in the last three lines of section 1 which I quote:

Or campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee properly reported as required by law.

I do not remember just what the law is on that subject; but, as I recall it, the national committee is required to report the contributions made to it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. That report, of course, can not be made until after the contributions reach the committee. Will not this provision, therefore, make the sender of the contribution criminally liable if the national committee does not do its duty and make the report?

Mr. CLAPP. I should hope so.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the intent?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Of course, the law as to gathering and reporting contributions is changing from time to time, and the only thing we could do with that was to make it so that as the law relating to contributions might be changed it would automatically fall within the scope of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not think the Senator from Minnesota quite gathers my meaning. The national committee begins its work. It asks for contributions. Of course, it could not secure a single contribution if the making of that contribution would become criminal in the event that the national committee did not do its duty; for no man would be willing to make a contribution for a campaign if an event over which he had no control whatsoever could make him a criminal.

Mr. CLAPP. But the Senator will bear in mind that at the foundation of this lies the condition that the contribution shall be made knowingly.

The language is "to knowingly send or furnish to be sent or transmitted, or to carry or cause to be sent or carried," and so forth. It seems to me that if the contributor is acting in good faith and the committee is acting in good faith there will be no difficulty about its getting contributions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not care whether there are any contributions made or not. There are a good many exceptions here that I do not think ought to be made.

Mr. CLAPP. I rather agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. But to enact a law that will permit a national committee to solicit contributions from all over the country, which, of course, must be sent from State to State in order to reach their object, and then to say that a contribution, innocent when made, made for an entirely proper purpose, shall become criminal if the national committee does not make the report required by law, is indirectly to prohibit all contributions to a national fund, it would seem to me.

Mr. CLAPP. Either the Senator misunderstood me or I misunderstood him. The criminality would not attach to a contribution made in good faith by a man to the committee, and the committee subsequently sending it without reporting the contribution. The committee would then be the party offending or whoever of the committee did the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota knows much more about the bill than I do, because I have given it only hasty consideration.

Mr. CLAPP. The language is, briefly:

That this act shall not apply to * * * campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee properly reported as required by law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. If the Senator from Minnesota will listen to me for just a moment, he will see my point. It may be good, or it may not be good.

In the first place, it is made unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee to send money from one State to another to be expended for and on behalf of the nomination or election of a President, Vice President, elector of President and Vice President, or Member of Congress.

If the bill were to stop there, of course not a penny could be contributed to a national committee for any of these purposes, except that which was raised in the State in which the national committee was actively doing its business.

But you then introduce certain exceptions. You say that this prohibition shall not apply to the payment of bills incurred by a National or State campaign committee in the fitting out and maintenance of speaking campaigns, and so forth; nor shall it apply to contributions to cover the actual expenses of speakers, and so forth; nor to the expenses of the distribution of literature by a national committee. Then it is provided that the prohibition shall not apply to campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee properly reported as required by law.

Suppose they are not reported as required by law. Then the person who sent them—it may be months before—instantly becomes subject to the criminal provisions of this statute.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think the important thing here is to guard against the improper use of money. The last remark of the Senator brings me back to my first understanding of his question. If a man makes a contribution to a national campaign committee, the law requires that contribution to be reported. If there is such a condition existing between the contributor and the committee that the committee does not report it, I think the contributor ought to be held responsible for it. I do not think the contributor will have any trouble in contributing to a national committee where it is done in good faith.

It has been difficult to frame this bill. There are exemptions here that it would seem we might have avoided; and yet of course everyone understands what is necessary to get bills reported. I think if the bill is weak anywhere, if it fails to accomplish a meritorious purpose, it will be in failure to prevent rather than in limitation upon the honest exercise of the rights that are exempted.

I have no objection to a modification in this respect, if the Senator from Iowa can frame it in a manner that will be more satisfactory. I have no pride of language in this bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that that defect might be cured by inserting, after the word "committee," in line 20, the words "which shall be properly reported by the committee."

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator repeat his suggestion?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest that it be made to read, "or campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee, and which shall be properly reported as required by law."

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to that language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the language just suggested does not change the meaning in any degree. What the Senator from Iowa is aiming at is that a person who had contributed funds and sent them to a national committee, thinking himself protected by this exemption, might subsequently find that he was penalized because of the failure of the committee to report, accidentally or on purpose. What the Senator from Iowa really wants is about this:

Sent to a national committee required by law to report.

Then he wants to add at the end of that:

But the members of such committee shall be responsible and penalized if the contribution be not reported as required by law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. I should like to see those punished who are guilty of the offense, and I should like to see those who are not guilty have some immunity.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the writing which I have been handed by the Senator is a little difficult to read. I should appreciate it if the Senator would state, on behalf of the committee, the proposed amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state it if the Secretary will take it down.

After the word "committee," in line 20, strike out the balance of the language in lines 20 and 21 and substitute the following:

Required by law to report.

Then insert a comma and add the following language:

But the members of the committee shall be responsible and penalized as hereinafter provided if the contribution be not reported as required by law.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I confess that I am not favorably disposed toward the enactment of criminal laws subjecting men to imprisonment in the penitentiary for transgressions which are not in themselves criminal. I think we are going, not only in this instance, but in many others, too far in the enactment of criminal laws, and subjecting men either to imprisonment or to the annoyance and expense and mortification of having to defend themselves on the criminal side of the court on account of charges which in themselves carry no moral turpitude. I am not in favor of surrounding all of our people with a perfect network of criminal law to such an extent that men in the ordinary avocations of life and the pursuit of their ordinary business affairs can not put out hand or foot in either direction without being in danger of being caught in the meshes of the criminal law.

It is difficult to know exactly what is in this bill, because of the great number of amendments which have been proposed and accepted and adopted, which have not been put into print. As I understand the general purpose of the bill, however, it is to make those who are engaged in the transmission of money in one way or another criminally liable if they transmit money which is intended to be used in furthering the nomination or the election of various officers who are named in the bill, from the President of the United States down.

That, of course, is an object designed to further the general purpose of securing pure elections in this country. All of us want pure elections. I certainly want them myself. I favored the legislation, in furtherance of that purpose, requiring publicity on the part of those who are themselves candidates, not only as to money expended by them but as to money received by them. I have favored the provisions of law which have been proposed and enacted which limit the amount of contributions and the amount of money which may be expended. I favor the general purpose of this legislation; but I think we are going too far when we propose to invade the ordinary business world, and subject to the danger of having to undergo trial, if not actual punishment, men engaged in the ordinary business avocation of transmitting money in one way or another, either by check or draft, through express companies or otherwise, who themselves have no connection with these elections and possibly no interest in the candidates.

Am I correct in all that?

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator repeat his inquiry?

Mr. BACON. It is a pretty long one. I do not know that I could repeat it without almost rehearsing what I have already said.

Mr. CLAPP. The inquiry is—

Mr. BACON. I will state it somewhat more briefly than I did before. As I understand the purpose of the bill, it is to subject to criminal prosecution men who are engaged in the transmission of money which is designed to further the candidacy of any man in a nomination or in an election of the various officers specified in the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Except under certain conditions.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of it generally, without the exceptions. That is the general purpose; then there are certain exceptions made.

Mr. CLAPP. The object of the bill is to prevent money from money centers being sent into States to influence the election of Congressmen and Senators and presidential electors in those States. I could not put it as well as the Senator from Mississippi put it when he said it was to prevent the mobilization of money where there is a crucial campaign.

I do not think the Senator from Georgia was here the other day when it was stated that every special election between now and the next general election will be of unusual interest and unusual temptation by reason of the benefit that the result may be supposed to bring to the party that can carry the particular district involved. That was one reason for the more immediate pressure of this bill.

The bill exempts the payment of bills incurred by a National or State campaign committee in the fitting out and maintenance of speaking campaigns by a candidate for the office of President or Vice President where a train is fitted out and maintained by the National or State committee. It exempts the actual expenses of speakers sent out by a National or State committee. It exempts the expenses of literature distributed by a national committee. Of course the broad purpose is, where capital is gathered and mobilized, to prevent its being sent and used in crucial, critical districts. The bill goes further than that and seeks to prevent also the sending of money even to influence or secure the nomination of candidates for office.

Of course I realize, as the committee realizes, that this is going into a broad domain; but conditions exist which I do not need to rehearse. I think every Senator knows the conditions that have existed in the past. It does seem as though a State where there are no great capitalists, where there is no great concentration of wealth, should not be deluged and debauched from any common center of wealth in the political activities of the country.

I share somewhat with the Senator the disinclination to be constantly invading the domain of the citizen, but I believe we have reached a point in this matter where it is justified.

Mr. BACON. I am waiting for the Senator to finish.

Mr. CLAPP. I have finished, unless the Senator has some other question.

Mr. BACON. I was not asking the Senator a question. I had the floor in my own right.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood the Senator to ask me a question.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no. In the course of my presentation of the matter I asked whether I was right, if that was what the Senator meant. He asked me to repeat my question, and I have repeated it, and he has answered it.

Mr. CLAPP. I beg the Senator's pardon. I certainly thought the Senator asked me a question as to what was intended.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thought I had interrupted him?

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; the Senator from Minnesota was sitting here in conference with another Senator. The Senator from Georgia was speaking. He put his language in the form of a question, and he looked directly at the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BACON. I have repeated it and the Senator has answered it.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I was justified in answering the question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly. I merely wished to know if the Senator was through. I did not wish to interrupt him until he was through.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; the Senator is through unless there is some further question to be asked.

Mr. BACON. We have now on the statute books, if I recollect correctly, laws which prohibit the contribution by corporations to these elections. I fully sympathize with the purpose of the bill. I certainly desire in every proper way to prevent the electorate from being debauched. I sympathize in every proper way with the preventing of sending a flood of money from any money center or elsewhere to any particular community for the purpose of influencing and controlling an election. Therefore I have favored, as I said, the legislation which we have had along this line, which requires a candidate to make a full exhibit as to how much money he has spent in a campaign and which limits the amount of money which he shall use in a campaign. If I recollect correctly, the legislation which we have had recognizes the right of a candidate to receive contributions, provided those contributions do not swell his expenditures beyond the limitation which the law has placed upon them.

Yet according to his bill, if I read it correctly, if any man sends to a candidate money to aid him in his campaign, the person through whom he sends it will be liable to criminal prosecution and liable to be put in the penitentiary. It seems to me that there is a gross inconsistency in that, and not only a gross inconsistency but a gross injustice.

Mr. President, it is not safe because an evil exists to endeavor to correct that evil by something which may be a greater evil.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BACON. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. Is there any inherent evil in prohibiting a man from receiving money other than that which is authorized by law and which is to be accounted for?

Mr. BACON. That is not this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. That is this bill exactly. It is hard enough to meet this situation under any frame of law. If the Senator will pardon me, we have our committees. This proposed law recognizes the committees. It recognizes the right of a committee to collect contributions and to use those contributions, but it does seek to prevent the subterranean transfer of money from one section to another, and under the guise of contributions—

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me to go on. I will not occupy very much time.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I should join the Senator in any legislation which he proposes which will operate upon the candidate to prevent his making an undue use of money in elections. If it is deemed proper to do so, I am willing to go further and join in legislation which shall reach the party who is making the contribution and make it unlawful for a contribution, if you wish, just as we have made it unlawful for corporations to contribute. But the thing that I have in mind is a provision which does not reach either the contributor or the party who is to be benefited, but is seeking to lay the hand of the criminal law upon an innocent man. I say innocent. You say he must be knowingly guilty, but still, however clear the provision might be, he would be liable when innocent to prosecution, although he might escape conviction. You take a man who has nothing to do with a campaign, who is neither a contributor nor a recipient, but simply the man through whom it is transmitted, and you are making him by this bill the object of the vengeance of the law.

I say, Mr. President, however worthy the purpose may be and however pronounced an evil may be, it is a mistake, in my opinion, to attempt to correct that evil by the enactment of a law which itself may be a greater evil in its effect.

I do not think that the business men of this country engaged in the ordinary avocation of transmitting money from one place to another should be the men who should be subjected to criminal processes of law for the purpose of correcting this evil.

There is one thing certain. It is just as easy to reach the man who makes the contribution as it is to reach the man who carries the contribution, and it is very much better to correct this evil by reaching the man who makes the contribution and say he shall not make it than it is to reach the man who is simply engaged in the transmission of it. The man who is transmitting it is engaged in a regular business in which he is transmitting a great many other things which are not prohibited, and you are putting upon him a burden which it is improper to lay, it seems to me, upon the men engaged in a legitimate business in requiring them to scrutinize every package of money that is transmitted through them or any draft that is bought for the purpose of being transmitted, because while it may be true that upon the trial that man could prove he did not know for what purpose it was designed, yet he is subjected to the annoyance of a trial and the danger of a trial. Sometimes innocent men are convicted. At last it depends upon the judgment of other men.

I am very frank to say while I would go as far as the Senator in my desire to secure pure elections in this country, and I will go as far as he will or as may be deemed proper in the exercise of the judgment of the Senate or of Congress in reaching both the contributor of money and the recipient of money, unless I very much change my mind I am not going to be a party to legislation which will put a man engaged in the ordinary business of banking or in the ordinary business of transmitting money by one agency or another in the position of being subject to prosecution and possible confinement in a penitentiary because of a contribution made by one which we do not approve and a contribution received by another which we do not approve, he being the innocent intermediary through which the contribution has been transmitted.

Unless I change my mind very much, even at the risk of being thought to be unfriendly to the purpose of this legislation, I can not support this bill. I repeat that I am not unfriendly to the purpose of the legislation. I joined in the legislation which made it unlawful for corporations to make these contributions. I joined in the legislation which limited the amount which any candidate could receive and could expend. I will go further and join in other legislation to make it equally illegal, if we can constitutionally do so—I have not looked into that—for a person to contribute. Then let us punish the men who violate that law. I am in favor of the law of publicity, which requires a man to publish not only every dollar which he has received but the name of every person from whom he has received a dollar, and the amount he has received. That is proper legislation. If that is carried out, we will have the means of remedying the evil which the Senator deprecates and which he proposes to remedy by this drastic bill.

I repeat, I am not in favor of extending the criminal law of this country so that men engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, in their ordinary legitimate business, will not know how to reach a hand to the right or to the left without danger of its being stuck into the meshes of the criminal law. I am very much averse to criminal law being applied to anything that has not moral turpitude in it. Sometimes it is necessary to protect our revenue, and otherwise, that it should be done. Sometimes it is necessary in order to protect people from frauds which others not engaged in legitimate business criminally adopt for the purpose of carrying out nefarious purposes. Unless it is necessary, I think it is unwise that the criminal law should be extended to matters which in themselves have no moral turpitude. There is nothing in this which would indicate moral turpitude.

I repeat, Mr. President, it is not a sufficient answer to say that no man shall be convicted unless he has knowingly violated this proposed law. It is not sufficient to say that for the reason while a man may be acquitted he is not protected from annoyance and humiliation, to say nothing of the danger of being convicted, when he himself may be a perfectly innocent man engaged only in the ordinary avocations of life.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, whatever attitude the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] takes with reference to this bill, no man who knows him will impugn his motive. He is thoroughly alive to these evils, even though he may find it according to his convictions to vote against the bill.

I think in every law that we pass prohibiting the transmission of obscene matter and dangerous articles by express we provide that the carrier, if he knows he is transmitting such articles, is equally guilty. The carrier does not, under this bill, have to examine the package that he is carrying. He does not have to examine the source of the draft which may be sent. Presumably, what he does is legal and proper, but like the case of obscene literature transmitted by express, like the case of dangerous articles transmitted by carriers, if the carrier knows that he is transmitting obscene literature, if he knows that he is transmitting dangerous articles, I do not think there is a law on our statute books seeking to regulate and prohibit the transmission of such articles that does not include the carrier in the offense, if the carrier knows that he is a party to the violation of the law.

Mr. BACON. The Senator certainly would not cite as a parallel case the attempt of the lawmaking power to preserve the morals of the country in the prohibition of the transmission of obscene, vulgar, and equally filthy productions of any kind. The Senator would not consider that a parallel case to this?

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. BACON. The men who would be engaged in sending obscene literature have nothing of that line that is legitimate. It is all of it illegitimate; it is all of it unlawful; all of it calls for the strong hand of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. But the literature that may be sent may not be obscene. The man who was engaged in sending the literature may be engaged in doing something a part of which is legal and right and a part of which is wrong.

I do not care to take advantage of this opportunity to speak of the importance of the purity of the electorate or the evils of the corruption and debauchery of the electorate, but I do not know of anything that in the long history of this Republic means more to the weal or woe of this Republic than the honesty of political activities. I think the man who will send money to debauch an electorate is no better than a man who sends out obscene literature. The man who is carrying money, whether through a banking process or by express, is doing just what the man who is carrying literature is doing. He may carry literature that is good or he may unknowingly carry literature that is bad. He may carry money that is good or he may unknowingly carry money the purpose of which is bad. It is only when it can be shown that he knows he is voluntarily a party that he is to be punished. Underlying all this proposition is the broad question of our right and duty to prevent the sending of money from money centers into other States to be used for these purposes. Owing to the fact that the carrier is an incident to this situation, we can do no less than make him liable if he is knowingly a party to what is recognized as the proper subject of prohibition by law.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Of course, in order to convict the carrier, there would have to be an illegal sending, because unless the thing was illegally sent there would be no crime. In order to show that you would have to show who was the sender. You could not convict a carrier unless you could ascertain both the person who sent it and the person to whom it was sent.

Now, they are the people to reach; and if you can reach the carrier, you can reach them. Make it unlawful for the man to send it, if you wish, and then the man sends the money at his own risk. Make the man who receives it the perpetrator of the crime, if he does take it. There you have two men whom you can inspect. Why do you go to the carrier when you can reach both the others?

Mr. CLAPP. For several reasons, which I will explain in a moment. But in the case of obscene literature we have the man who sends it, and we have the man who receives it for the purpose of distribution, and still we include the carrier who knowingly is a party to the distribution of the obscene literature. This is still more difficult. If this carrier is not included, a man may take money in person and carry it to the State where it is to be used. No one in that case has sent it; he has simply put in his pocket his own money, we will suppose. In order to reach that sinister purpose, in order to reach that condition, if we do anything with this matter, we have to do just what we do with the ordinary carrier whom we prohibit, namely, make the party who carries it and who knows he is a party to it respond equally with the others.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not rise to ask anything with regard to the point now under discussion, but I do want an expression from the Senator from Minnesota upon another phase of the bill. It goes without saying that we are all in favor of preventing the improper use of money for political purposes. I hardly need assert that. But there is danger sometimes in the effort to reach an acknowledged evil of presenting a law which will intensify a wrong rather than correct it.

I put now to the Senator from Minnesota a question. He will observe that the question involves a great problem of government. Suppose Samuel Gompers, as president of the American Federation of Labor, were to send money into the State of New Jersey in order to assist in the election or nomination of a candidate for Congress in that State, the money to be expended, of course, in a legitimate way for speakers or for literature. Would he become a criminal under the terms of this act?

Mr. CLAPP. If the Standard Oil Co.—

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not ask about the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Standard Oil Co. sent money into New Jersey to be used for campaign purposes, they would be guilty under this statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I took the case of the president of the Federation of Labor. I am asking about things that have been done.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly; and I am illustrating it with illustrations that have occurred.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Minnesota does not answer my question. Does he understand that under those circumstances the officers of the Federation of Labor would become liable to the penal provisions of this act?

Mr. CLAPP. I will answer that very promptly, very candidly, and, I think, very definitely. If this bill becomes a law, any person, firm, copartnership, or corporation that sends money into the State of New Jersey to influence the nomination of a Member of Congress or the election of a Representative or a Senator, or the election of a President or Vice President or of their electors, would be guilty.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, we have, Mr. President, the peculiar situation, that if the money is sent to and is distributed by what is known here as a Republican national committee or a Democratic national committee, or any other political committee, it may be done without offense; but if any other great society, however altruistic in its purpose, attempts to influence the election or nomination of Members of Congress it becomes an offender against the law.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; the committee—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Representing a special interest—

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill does not say anything about "a special interest." It says any person sending any money or causing any money to be sent from one State to another shall commit the offense if that money is to be used to secure the nomination or election of a President or Vice President, or the electors of either, or a Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate. The committee, however, having charge of this bill saw very clearly that it must make certain exceptions, and the exceptions were made in behalf of recognized political committees. Moneys may be properly sent to and expended by those committees; but I take it that there are other societies in the country that may properly interest themselves in the public welfare to the extent of taking a part in political campaigns for or against the nomination of Members of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota—

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Iowa will yield—

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The distinction in this bill is perfectly clear. It is the distinction between the receipt of money by a committee required by law to make a report and a committee not so required by law to make a report. This bill does not say "political committee" at all. If a committee of capitalists intending to destroy labor or a committee of laborers intending to destroy capital, not required by law to make a report, shall undertake to mobilize capital and money and to direct it to a particular point for the purpose of accomplishing this object, that falls within the purview of the bill; and it ought to fall within the purview of the bill, for it is subverting a private and class interest at the expense of the general public.

Now, if the Senator will read the provisions of the bill carefully, he will see that the exceptions direct themselves toward committees which are required by law to make a report; and in the amendment which I suggested a moment ago, and which was accepted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], that point was maintained.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted still further to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Minnesota—

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say that the view of the Senator from Mississippi as to the subject is a correct view, but that view is not covered by this bill as I read it. Let us get it clearly in our minds. The bill provides:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, or any officer or agent of any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee, to send—

I need not read more of that—to any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee in any other State or Territory of the United States, including the District of Columbia; or from any insular possession of the United States to any person, firm, corporation, association, or committee in any State or Territory of the United States, including the District of Columbia, to be used or expended for and on behalf of the nomination or election of a President or Vice President of the United States, or of any Member of the House of Representatives, or any Member of the United States Senate—

and so forth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, the exception follows it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. That is the statement of the prohibitions; that is the declaration of the law, the violation of which makes the person who violates it a criminal. Now, let us see about the exceptions. There are certain exceptions to that, namely:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to the payment of bills incurred by a national or State campaign committee in the fitting out and maintenance of speaking campaigns by a candidate for the office of President or Vice President, where a train is fitted out and maintained by the national or State committee; nor shall it include the actual expenses of speakers sent out by a national or State committee, the expenses of literature distributed by a national committee, advertisements marked as such paid for by a national committee, or campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee properly reported as required by law.

I make no point as to the latter, because while I have not examined it critically I assume that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi will cover the point I originally made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely.

Mr. CUMMINS. But what I am now calling to the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is this: That the bill makes it impossible for an innocent person to send money under any circumstances to another innocent person in another State to be used in a political way; that is, to be used for the nomination or election of these various candidates. That will make it impossible for an association like the American Federation of Labor to send any money anywhere, no matter how worthy the purpose may be—that is, in the circulation of literature or to pay the expenses of a speaker—if the object is to affect the nomination of a candidate for Congress or the election of a candidate for Congress. It will make it impossible for the National Association of—

Mr. CLAPP. Woman Suffrage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Woman suffrage—

Mr. CLAPP. I will attend to that in a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. To send any money. I am simply going over the list. At the same time, it would make it impossible for the National Association of Manufacturers to send any money. The Senator from Minnesota can not segregate the selfish interests and prohibit them without at the same time including the altruistic societies and prohibiting them. If he can find any way in which to do it, I would be very glad to assist in it; but I am not prepared to say, so far as I am concerned, that committees are the only persons who can honestly and for the public welfare expend money in the nomination and election of Members of Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me there is a complete misunderstanding of this provision.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to finish my statement.

Mr. THOMAS. What I had to say had reference to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, we can not in this bill name the American National Manufacturers' Association—I think that is what the association referred to by the Senator from Iowa is called—we can not name any particular organizations. The purpose of the bill is to bring political activities as much into the light as they can be brought. The law already recognizes committees, National and State, and any association of American citizens, no matter what their purpose may be, if they desire to take part in the election of Representatives, Senators, the President, and presidential electors may organize their committees. They will then be required to make public their contributions and their disbursements. The same opportunity is offered to the most highly altruistic as to the most partisan political organization. All they have to do is to avail themselves of the law of this country, organize their committees, call them political committees, and then come within the requirements of the law as to publicity.

I am most heartily in favor of woman suffrage, but yet if money is to be sent into a State to influence the election of Representatives or Senators by those who are interested in woman suffrage, if the sentiment back of woman suffrage is to be a political force taking part in political activities in the propaganda preceding the final securing of woman suffrage, then that propaganda ought to be an open, organized propaganda, submitting to the laws requiring reports of receipts and expenditures the same as any other political propaganda.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it true that any of these societies could bring themselves into the existing law with regard to reports by simply filing reports? I may be wrong about it, but I did not know that such an organization as the American Federation of Labor, for instance, could bring itself within the statute requiring reports of campaign expenditures and contributions. If that be so, very much of my objection disappears.

Mr. CLAPP. I will answer the Senator very readily. Under the laws of the United States the American Protective Association can meet, call itself a political body, organize its committees, and by making its reports as required of political organizations can come within the exceptions of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, they need not even go that far; they need not call themselves "political" at all. All they have to do is to organize a national or a State committee.

Mr. CLAPP. It might be necessary to adopt some name.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They may call it a campaign committee, whether they are responsible to a political party or not. They may enter as a State or national campaign committee opposed to all political parties.

Mr. CLAPP. The fact remains that under this bill any body of American citizenship, whatever their purpose, can avail themselves of the exemptions of this bill by organizing their national and State committees and making public their contributions and expenditures.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asked a question a few moments ago, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] answered it by referring to the Standard Oil Co., which was for purposes of illustration; but the question and the answer suggested to my mind what may be a serious objection to this measure, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota. Such great institutions as the Standard Oil Co. have their headquarters and their business in every State of the Union and every Territory in the Union. As a consequence, if they desire to take part in political campaigns, it is not necessary for them to transmit money from one State to another at all. The money is there. All that is necessary under those circumstances is to dispose of the money as may be desired, whereas in the case of organizations and institutions less widespread in character the prohibition against the transmission of any money is effective; in consequence of which, it seems to me that the bill gives a tremendous advantage to the huge concerns which the bill is aimed to restrict as against a class whose activities do not so much need to be so restricted.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, if this bill becomes a law and the Standard Oil Co. through its agencies directs the payment of money in Iowa for political purposes prohibited by this act, and that fact can be established, there can be no question that they would be punishable under the law.

Mr. THOMAS. If this proposed statute goes as far as that, the Senator may be correct—

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, they are prohibited from making any contributions at all.

Mr. THOMAS. But I do not so read it. For instance, the Standard Oil Co. at present consists of perhaps a score or more of corporations.

Mr. CUMMINS. How many?

Mr. THOMAS. Quite a number—a score or more.

Mr. CUMMINS. Thirty-four. The original Standard Oil Co. was divided into 34 corporations.

Mr. THOMAS. These corporations are located and have their domiciles in a great many States in the Union. I do not understand that this bill would reach, for example, a contribution in the State of Indiana by the Indiana Standard Oil Co.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but the law against corporations making contributions would reach them.

Mr. THOMAS. That is another law.

Mr. CLAPP. That is another law, and it is another case from this. This law does not seek to reach that at all.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see how this bill can reach that situation; and if we have such a law, why the necessity of this?

Mr. CLAPP. The necessity for this is to prevent their sending money from one State into another.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, is this not quite different? The statute of 1907 makes it unlawful for "any national bank or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress to make a money contribution in connection with any election to any political office." It provides that "it shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to make a money contribution in connection with any election at which presidential and vice presidential electors or a Representative in Congress is to be voted for, or any election by any State legislature of a United States Senator."

The object of the pending bill is to prevent the sending of contributions by an individual from one State into another. Is not that the case?

Mr. CLAPP. That is the primary object. Of course to-day a corporation can not openly make a contribution, but a corporation in one State might in a subterranean way send money to another State. Nobody claims that this law is a cure-all. It is an effort to reach the sinister, subterranean transmission and deluging of districts and States with money from centers where they have it in abundance.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that the words "corporation" and "association" are used here out of abundant caution, to repel the existing law?

Mr. CLAPP. Why, of course.

Mr. BURTON. What the bill really includes for the first time is a person, a firm, and, perhaps, a committee. The corporations were forbidden to contribute before.

Mr. CLAPP. They were forbidden to make any contribution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. BURTON. What is that amendment? As I understand, it is on page 2.

Mr. CLAPP. Let the Secretary report it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of section 1, lines 20 and 21, it is proposed to strike out the words "properly reported as required by law" and in lieu thereof to insert:

Required by law to report, but the members of the committee shall be responsible and penalized as hereinafter provided if the contribution be not reported as required by law.

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think the second provision is rather severe. A political committee is oftentimes made up of a very considerable number of persons, only a few of whom have to do with the disbursement or receipt of money. Two of the statutes already passed on that subject—that of June 25, 1910, and that of August 19, 1911—require that there shall be a treasurer, and that all contributions shall be reported to him; and he is the one made responsible for making these statements.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Senator's position is correct. At least, the previous language would make any member of the committee liable who knowingly did it and I think would free the matter from complications.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me "required by law to report" covers the case sufficiently. There might be a member entirely innocent of any wrongdoing who did not know of these contributions and who would be penalized by the language suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The object of the amendment was to make the members of these committees keep track of what was being done and to punish them if they did not. We have a good deal of this careless director business and a good deal of other things of that sort in the country. If you undertake to punish merely the secretary or the treasurer, I believe the Senator said, you do what has been done too much all the time.

A number of men are appointed members of a campaign committee, which is a branch subcommittee of a national committee. They surrender the entire management to one man, and he reports, or does not report, as recently happened in the great Empire State of this country. Everybody else claims ignorance of what has happened, as the directors of a bank claim ignorance of the fact that the bank has been violating the law. I think they all ought to be punished—the directors in one case and the members of the committee in the other—because they do not attend to their work.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and also the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who are interested in this bill on behalf of the committee, if they are not willing to lay it aside now in order that we may have a short executive session? It is nearly 6 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it would be better to finish the bill, if we can.

Mr. CLAPP. We are through with all the amendments. It will not take five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will not take long.

The repetition of the latter part of that language, "as required by law," I think does not cut much figure. It was repeated for the sake of greater clearness of expression and lucidity of thought. The object of the amendment was to keep an innocent party who had sent money on to a committee which had not made a report as provided by law from being punished and to punish the committee.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to this matter of common knowledge and common sense: He knows as well as I do that if the members of this committee knew they were going to be punished unless these reports were made, they would see to it that the man who was put in the position of making the report was a man upon whom they could rely to make the report. He would be that sort of a man. There would be no practical difficulty about it at all. He would never dare to fail to make a report of a contribution, partially because he himself would be punished—and, with the divergence of punishment meted out to offenders, he would be chiefly punished—and partially because of the fact that the other men upon the committee would be bound up with him, would be in precisely the same boat, and the very first instructions they would give to him would be that under all circumstances, always, every contribution must be reported.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I hardly think it is a proper thing for us to go on and dispose of an important bill like this, which seems to be the subject of a great deal of doubt in the mind of every Senator, with only a dozen Senators on the floor; and I hope he will realize that it is necessary to lay it aside. For one, I am not willing to see the bill passed with only a dozen Senators present. I think it is an exceedingly questionable bill. I am not satisfied with its provisions, and I am not prepared to vote for it. It seems to me to be very crude and very difficult of comprehension. I for one am not willing to see it enacted into law with only a dozen Senators on the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator can defeat it, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not care to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I thought the Senator would realize the wisdom of laying the bill aside at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; I am not willing to lay the bill aside. We commenced its consideration at 2 o'clock. If the bill had been considered continuously, we could have finished it in two or three hours. It was laid aside by reason of a discussion with reference to the action and doings of the Committee on Banking and Currency. We have now completed the bill except for one simple amendment. I can not, in justice—

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota, with all the amendments which have been made to the bill, if he does not think it ought to be printed, so that we can see what it is before we vote upon it?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir. Every amendment has been simply to strengthen and make plainer the purpose of the bill. The bill was thoroughly considered in the committee by some of the strongest Senators here, and every amendment but one or two is printed, and they are merely verbal changes. The Senator must either let the bill pass or he must defeat it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was to avoid that that I made the suggestion that it would be well to lay the bill aside until it could be taken up when more Senators were on the floor. I do not think two or three Senators ought to legislate for the whole United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make the point of order that the call for a quorum ends debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Chamberlain	Norris	Sterling
Bradley	Cummins	Poinexter	Vardaman
Brady	Lane	Sheppard	Williams
Bryan	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Burton	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-two Senators have answered to the roll call—not a quorum.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, October 16, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 13, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of hosts, Father of all souls, we bless Thee, that the holy of holies is always accessible to Thy children, that all who will may enter in and drink freely from the fountain of life, be exalted, ennobled, purified. Impart unto us grace sufficient unto our needs, that we may live to the full measure of Christian manhood this day. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, October 11, 1913, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On September 30, 1913:

H. R. 8364. An act to authorize the President to provide a method for opening lands restored from reservation or withdrawal, and for other purposes.

On October 3, 1913:

H. R. 3321. An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7377. An act extending to the port of Perth Amboy, N. J., the privileges of section 7 of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement;

S. 99. An act to fix the times and places of holding district court for the district of Arizona;

S. 2254. An act to amend chapter 1, section 18, of the Judicial Code; and

S. 2727. An act to create an additional land district in the State of Nevada.

On October 6, 1913:

H. R. 1681. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Red Lake River in township 153 north, range 40 west, in Red Lake County, Minn.;

H. R. 1985. An act to authorize the county of Aitkin, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Aitkin County, Minn.;

H. R. 6378. An act to authorize Robert W. Buskirk, of Matewan, W. Va., to bridge the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at Matewan, Mingo County, W. Va., where the same forms the boundary line between the States of West Virginia and Kentucky;

H. R. 6582. An act to authorize the city of Fairmont to construct and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, in the State of West Virginia;

H. R. 6635. An act to authorize the county of Hamilton, in the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River at Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee;

H. R. 7469. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Little River at or near Lepanto, Ark.;

H. R. 7470. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Black River at or near the section line between sections 8 and 9, in township 20 north, range 5 east, being a short distance south and east of the town of Corning, Clay County, Ark.;

H. R. 7472. An act authorizing Beaufort and St. Helena Townships, Beaufort County, S. C., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Beaufort River in Beaufort County, S. C.;

H. R. 7596. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Beloit, Kans.; and

H. R. 7875. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Augusta, Ga.

On October 7, 1913:

H. R. 5891. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across White River at Newport, Ark.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7898) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 8 and 107 to the bill (H. R. 7898) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, and recedes from its amendments Nos. 10, 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 82, 93, and 97.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] is recognized.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of October 10 appears the following. I was not present at the time, being absent in Alabama conducting my senatorial campaign.

Mr. MANN. On what page is it?

Mr. HOBSON. It is on page 6159 of the RECORD. I quote the following:

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, in order to remove the charge I made it deserves an explanation or an apology. I had in my mind, gentlemen, our leaders who have been absent from here for more than four months. I had in mind the gentleman from Alabama, whose last appearance here was on the 7th of May, 1913, when he talked upon the subject of economic conditions in the South, and especially in Alabama. Now, that great leader is responsible for the absenteeism, because when men of his type leave this House the new Member, or a Member of a shorter term of service than he, will leave. When that great naval constructor, so to speak, who thinks he is fit to be President of these United States, has taken himself away from his duties in this House, when we have sent out an order by the way of the Sergeant at Arms—

In order to understand that, I will read from the previous column Mr. DONOVAN's remarks that were interrupted, as follows:

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, having only three minutes, I prefer not to be interrupted. We are saying a great deal here about the employees. There ought to be a word said about ourselves. I had stated the other day that our leaders, so to speak, were in fault as to the conditions here on account of absenteeism.

And then again on page 6174, in the RECORD of the same date, is found the following:

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I read from an editorial in the Bridgeport (Conn.) Farmer of September 20 the following:

"When a Congressman runs away from his work and is consistently and frequently absent from the scene of his duties, he defrauds the people of that which he agreed to give them. He does wrong."

Then, again, a little farther down in the same column, he proceeds:

Some few days ago I called attention to the fact that some of the leaders had practically abandoned their duties here and left the management of the business of the House to new men. A great currency measure was up for action, and at the same time a great tariff bill, that had taken months to construct, had come into the House with the Senate disagreeing.

And then farther down in the same column is the following: A most noticeable absentee was one who is considered by himself to be presidential timber.

I do not suppose the record of the Clerk can notice the laughter of the reader to inject there.

A most noticeable absentee was one who is considered by himself to be presidential timber, and who is, perhaps, one of the most able ones amongst us. He has been seen here once or twice since about May 7. Now, when this great mind from Alabama absented himself from his duties and left the affairs of the Nation to new Members, how can it be expected that some of the new Members will not feel that the country will surely run along without them if it can run along without the services of the gentleman who is considered of presidential timber? We were called here by our President on April 7 last; and what an example it was that this naval constructor, who would have a battleship in every man's front yard, remained with us until May 7, when he left us as though the session was over as far as he was concerned? What sort of a condition would we have here if every Member who has been here a lesser number of terms should absent himself in the same way?

Now, there has been a daily absenteeism that averages 250 Members for several weeks past.

Honor should at least dictate that they who can not attend should resign or do their duty as they promised by their oaths. They receive good pay and are honored by being Members of the National House, to say nothing of the prestige it gives a Member to be sent to Congress. It is likewise true that absenteeism is prevalent amongst the older Members of the minority. What a spectacle for one of the great leaders, Mr. GARDNER, of Massachusetts, to take himself away in the middle of July, seeking other honors and another position.

And so forth.

Mr. Speaker, the press dispatches of the next day took up the same matter. I quote from the Birmingham Age-Herald of October 11 briefly. The headlines are:

CONGRESSMAN DONOVAN ATTACKS HOBSON FOR ABSENTEEISM FROM HOUSE—ALABAMA CONGRESSMAN ALLUDED TO AS THE "GREAT NAVAL CONSTRUCTOR" WHO HAS BEEN ABSENT FROM POST SINCE MAY 7—MINORITY LEADER MANN DEFENDS MISSING CONGRESSMAN.

[By C. E. Stewart.]

WASHINGTON, October 10 (special).—An echo of the Senatorial fight in Alabama was heard in the House to-day when Representative DONOVAN, of Connecticut, vigorously attacked RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON for absenteeism.

Mr. DONOVAN did not refer to Mr. HOBSON by name, but alluded to the "gentleman from Alabama, the great naval constructor," who, he said, had been absent from his post since May 7.

Then the item proceeds:

"Any Member of Congress who remains away from his duties is defrauding the people of the United States out of the money they pay him as salary," charged Mr. DONOVAN.

That is quoted from an Alabama paper. Again, on the same day, I quote a local paper to indicate the interpretation of the press in the report that went to the country at large. I quote this from the Washington Post of October 11, under the heading—

CALLS OFF CLAYTON—PRESIDENT'S REQUEST TAKES HIM FROM SENATE RACE—BIG BOOST FOR UNDERWOOD—JUDICIARY CHAIRMAN IS BADLY NEEDED IN THE HOUSE, SAYS WILSON—REGARDING MR. WILSON AS PARTY LEADER, MR. CLAYTON WILL YIELD—HOBSON WOULD THEN BE ONLY OPPONENT OF THE AUTHOR OF THE TARIFF BILL TO SUCCEED THE LATE SENATOR JOHNSTON—DONOVAN ATTACKS HOBSON.

President Wilson yesterday gave a big impetus to the candidacy of Representative OSCAR UNDERWOOD, the Democratic leader, for the United States Senate from Alabama. Through the personal efforts of the President, Representative HENRY D. CLAYTON has decided to withdraw as a candidate for the Senate. This leaves the field to Mr. UNDERWOOD and Representative RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON, one of whom will probably succeed to the place made vacant by the death of Senator Joseph F. Johnston.

A little farther down in the same paragraph appears this statement from Mr. DONOVAN. I shall not take the time to read the President's letter and other matters that are not relevant to the matter at issue. The caption of this subhead is "Defrauding the people," says DONOVAN, and then it proceeds:

An echo of the senatorial fight was heard in the House yesterday. Representative HOBSON was attacked by Representative JEREMIAH DONOVAN, of Connecticut, in the course of a speech denouncing absenteeism. He did not mention Mr. HOBSON's name, but addressed his remarks to "the gentleman from Alabama, the great naval constructor." Mr. DONOVAN said that Mr. HOBSON had been absent from his duties since May 7.

"Any Member of Congress who remains away from his duties," said Mr. DONOVAN, "is defrauding the people of the United States out of the money they pay to him as salary."

Some Members of the House interpreted Mr. DONOVAN's remarks as a direct accusation against Mr. HOBSON.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman mentions that for some weeks the average absenteeism has amounted to 250 Members. Now, I would not have troubled the House if he had simply included me with those.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to address the House I think the House is perfectly willing to hear him.

Mr. HOBSON. I will state the question of personal privilege. I was coming to that. It is because my name is used specifically and because of such words as those which I have read and which the gentleman heard, "Defraud the Government" and "Honor should at least dictate that they who can not attend should resign or do their duty," that I rise to a question of personal privilege. Mr. Speaker, those references now directly involve a question of personal privilege, and I desire to address the House thereupon.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman has raised a question of personal privilege. If any gentleman on the floor had used language that was derogatory to the gentleman from Alabama, that language was subject to a point of order at the time, and could have been taken down, and the gentleman even punished by the House for the use of it. But when the House did not do that it is too late to raise a question of personal privilege on it. However, if the gentleman desires to address the House, and if, as is apparent, a certain situation in Alabama is introduced into the House, I submit that if my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] addresses the House, the other two candidates for Senator in the House should have an equal opportunity to speak.

Mr. HOBSON. I shall certainly raise no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care how many Members address the House, if they can put themselves in a position where they are entitled to address it; and the Chair thinks that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has stated a question of personal privilege. The charge is made almost in the language of the rule itself.

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The charge goes to the conduct of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] in his representative capacity, and that is the language of the rule.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Now, if the Washington Post or any newspaper in the country wanted to attack any Member of this House for things done in his personal capacity rather than his representative capacity, that would not furnish any question of privilege; but the offense charged against the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], both by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and by these newspapers, is that he is derelict in his duty as a Member of the House and is defrauding the Government out of his salary; and if that does not raise a question of privilege, the Chair can not understand what would raise one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Speaker finally rules let us see. The language used by the gentleman from Connecticut, which is the basis of the newspaper article, was that Members who were absent were defrauding the public. Can each one of the Members who has been absent during this session of Congress rise to a question of personal privilege based upon that, and first make a statement as to how long he has been absent and when; and second, argue the question as to whether he has defrauded the public?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not hold anything of the sort, but—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] is no different from the other Members.

The SPEAKER. He is in this different situation from the other Members. This matter divides itself into two parts, one what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] said and one what these newspapers said; and while the gentleman from Connecticut did not say "RICHMOND P. HOBSON," or "the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HOBSON," he described him, so that—

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Alabama could plead not guilty on this description. He is described as a great naval constructor, and certainly the gentleman could plead not guilty on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain whether he could plead not guilty on that. If a Member were to get up in this House and not say anything except to call for the naval constructor who is a Member of this House, everybody would know that it was Capt. HOBSON whom he was talking about. Now, we have what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] said, and then these newspapers came out and called him by name. It makes no difference what made them do it. Some of them, no doubt, had malice and some of them simply did it because they wanted to create a sensation; but, anyhow, the papers named Capt. HOBSON by name and charged him with defrauding the Government out of his salary.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Connecticut, as far as he charged anything, based it upon the newspaper report that all absentees—

The SPEAKER. Well, but leave the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] entirely out of this question—

Mr. MANN. Can each one of these Members now argue the question here as to whether he is defrauding the public by being absent? That is a matter of argument.

The SPEAKER. Suppose the Washington Post should charge the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with getting money out of the Government on false pretenses, under some pretext?

Mr. MANN. I should consider it beneath me to rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might consider it beneath him, but it is a question that goes to the integrity of the Member.

Mr. MANN. But these charges are made in the House. No quotation has been made here from any newspaper except to state what took place in the House.

The SPEAKER. I know, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has read from two newspapers, one the Washington Post and one the Birmingham Age-Herald. The Birmingham Age-Herald had great headlines stating that the gentleman from Connecticut, Congressman DONOVAN, attacked HOBSON; and then the article went on to state what he attacked him about, defrauding the Government. The Chair does not have any doubt about that being a question of personal privilege, leaving the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and his speech clear out of it.

Mr. MANN. I shall endeavor to confine the gentleman from Alabama purely to the question of personal privilege, unless we reach an agreement as to time, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama would relieve the situation, as far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned, if he would ask permission to address the House.

Mr. HOBSON. I will put it in that form, Mr. Speaker, in order to relieve the situation.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not know. I think it will take me 30 or 40 minutes, Mr. Speaker. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. MANN. Make it an hour.

Mr. HOBSON. Well, a Member rising to a question of personal privilege is allowed an hour, but I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one hour.

Mr. MANN. I couple with that the request that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] have permission to address the House for one hour each.

The SPEAKER. But they have not asked permission of the House. If either one of them should ask permission to address the House, the Chair has no doubt in the world that it would be granted.

Mr. MANN. But I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that each of these three gentlemen be permitted to address the House for one hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the request?

The SPEAKER. That the three gentlemen from Alabama mixed up in this senatorial matter shall each have an hour to address the House.

Mr. DENT. I object to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. They do not have to address the House unless they want to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois will modify his request when he is reminded of the fact that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] has formally withdrawn from the senatorial contest.

Mr. MANN. I did not know that; but that being the case, I will modify the request and ask that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] have an hour in which to address the House if he wishes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not intimated that he wanted to address the House.

Mr. MANN. But he might if we get into the senatorial situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for an hour. The gentleman from Illinois modifies the request of the gentleman from Alabama by including in it one hour for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he wishes to address the House for that length of time, or any time within the hour.

Mr. DENT. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have coupled with that leave for me to speak 10 minutes following the distinguished gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] couples with that the right to speak 10 minutes after the other gentlemen have got through.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I had not completed my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I desire to have 10 minutes to follow the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, who has seen fit to return to his post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] couples with that the request that he be permitted to speak 10 minutes after the gentlemen have concluded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, this question of personal privilege brings up first a question of fact which is very easily settled. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the first statement that I was absent from the House and have been absent continually since May 7. In the next quotation he said that I had been back once or twice. I desire to make the statement that I was here on May 8, 9, and 10, June 23, 24, 25, 26, August 26, 27, 28, September 16, 17, 18, 19, 29, and 30.

I notice that September 30 comes very near to the date of the gentleman's speech, and I may mention to him that I was not only present but I actually made a speech of a whole minute in length barring the part that was taken up by an interruption. The gentleman's remarks included the assumption that I was away during the preparation and passage of the tariff bill and the currency bill. Mr. Speaker, I was here during that time.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not want the gentleman to injure himself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would speak a little louder.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I intended to be courteous—

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Chair could not hear what the gentleman was saying.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will try and emphasize it. I wish to save the gentleman from injuring himself, if he will permit an interruption.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HOBSON. Very gladly.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Alabama is starting off wrong by saying that I had suggested that he was absent during the tariff bill or the preparation of the tariff bill. There was no such statement.

Mr. HOBSON. I will correct that, for I will say that the tariff bill passed before the 7th of May. The statement in the gentleman's speech was:

Some few days ago I called attention to the fact that some of the leaders had practically abandoned their duties here and left the management of the business of the House to new men. A great currency measure was up for action, and at the same time a great tariff bill that had taken months to construct had come into the House with the Senate disagreeing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this Congress was called together for the express purpose of the preparation and passage of these two great measures, and by our caucus action and by the action of the House practically all other business, with a few exceptions, has been excluded from the business of this session. I desire to state that I was present continually during the caucus proceedings and the preparation of the tariff bill. I do not mean to say that I was in the caucus personally all the time, but I was here expressly to attend that work and did so attend. I wish also to state, Mr. Speaker, that while I did not remain here for the general debate upon the tariff bill—and all gentlemen realize how few Members, exceedingly few, do so remain, because in general debate the subject is not confined to the bill itself—I came expressly for the purpose of taking part in the consideration of the tariff bill in its second reading under the five-minute rule. I was present through that consideration. I was present when the tariff bill passed.

I wish also to state, Mr. Speaker, that I came expressly for the purpose of taking part in the caucus preparation of the currency bill, and did so take part. I wish to say also that I was here and came expressly for the purpose of taking part in the consideration of the currency bill under the five-minute rule, not coming for the general debate for the reasons stated above. I did take part finally in the consideration and second reading of that bill and voted on the bill.

I wish further to state that I came to Washington expressly for the purpose of hearing the President's special message upon the relations with Mexico. I wish also to state that I came expressly to Washington and was here when the tariff bill came back from the Senate, and I took part in and voted upon the report of the conference committee.

Mr. Speaker, to put it briefly, I find that since May 7 I have voted upon 13 roll calls, and I was paired on all of the roll calls that I missed. I will not add the roll calls in the caucus. I was here, as far as I know, on every important bill except this last deficiency appropriation bill, which is nonpartisan. I wish to say, furthermore, that even upon the routine matters and unimportant roll calls there was not a day when I did not have my position as a Democratic voter with my party protected by a pair.

Mr. Speaker, while I was looking at these matters I thought I would see what the gentleman from Connecticut had been doing. I find that he failed to vote on a roll call on May 9 on the question of no quorum—on the second roll call on May 9. I note that he failed to vote on a roll call on June 27 and on a roll call on July 9. I may remark incidentally that upon those roll calls I find I was present and voted. Perhaps that is the reason the gentleman did not know that I was present. On July 22 he failed to vote, and again on July 22 on a roll call; and on July 23 he failed to vote, and on July 24. I notice this, Mr. Speaker, that in these eight cases where he failed to vote he had no pair and did not protect his party by having such a pair. I do not know that I would have been away from Congress at all—I will not say that, either; but, generally speaking, when important matters are liable to come up—unless I had gotten a pair.

The gentleman referred briefly to the new Members and their inexperience. It just occurs to me that perhaps in charity I might mention this. Perhaps the gentleman's experience has not been sufficient yet for him to find out respecting pairs, or, if he has found out, perhaps he thought, being so inexperienced, it did not matter very much whether a new Member was paired or not.

Mr. Speaker, while I was absent, I think it is due this House that I should tell it, that part of the time I was conducting a senatorial campaign in Alabama and part of the time I was lecturing, and if any gentleman would like to know the fractional part of the time, or anything further about these lectures, I would be glad to tell him; and I would like to say about my lectures generally, that they are like the Speaker's, subject to cancellation, subordinate to public duty. I want to say that during part of my absence I was also in the sixth district of Alabama conducting an expedition of Government experts through my district, the greatest experts in the world on farm sanitation, being the third of a series of expeditions that I have taken through my district when Congress was not in session. This time Congress happened to be in session, and I had to break away before this last expedition was completed to come back to one of the important votes to which I referred. I may mention incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that the first expedition to my district—and it is a rural district—dealt with plant life, and the Government's great experts dealing with plant life applied the principles to soil fertility, to crop rotation, and so forth, and preparation for the coming of the boll weevil.

The second expedition took account of animal life, and the great experts in the Government interpreted the principles of animal life as applied to live stock, cattle, hogs, poultry, the dairy, and the like, and the question of farm management, the balancing of animal industry with plant industry, and making farming a real business enterprise, and again took up the question of preparation for the coming of the boll weevil. I may mention incidentally in regard to the boll weevil that my district began preparation for the coming of the boll weevil six years before it arrived. It is perhaps—I do not say absolutely, but it is as far as I know—the only district in the United States that has ever been prepared for the boll weevil or even approximately prepared for the boll weevil before it arrived. Enter Alabama on the Alabama Great Southern Railroad, coming from Meridian, Miss., the railroad strikes the State line in one of my counties—Sumter County. On the Mississippi side of the line it is devastated by the boll weevil and the moment you cross the Alabama line it is blossoming like the rose. I mention that fact to gentlemen who may be interested in such matters. Now, the expedition I helped to conduct this year was devoted to human life.

The first was plant life, the second was animal life, and the third was human life, and, as I said, we had the greatest experts in the world, and this expedition demonstrated how, by the simple precaution of providing for the disposal of human waste—human excreta—we could save 1,200 to 1,500 deaths from typhoid alone in the rural districts of Alabama every year, and we could save thousands and thousands of babies who die in infancy. By simple precautions against the malaria mosquito we can practically eliminate malaria, chills, and fever. This will be of great value to my people. I mention this incidentally, because I want the gentleman from Connecticut, and also my colleagues here, whose opinion I cherish very highly, to realize that even though I am not here answering roll calls on unimportant matters I am not necessarily neglecting my duty or defrauding the Government.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HOBSON. Very gladly.

Mr. DONOVAN. The basis of my premise was that the gentleman was such a valuable man I wanted the gentleman among us, and I made my appeal along that line to bring the gentleman back.

Mr. HOBSON. I am delighted to hear it, and I will proceed at once to make my return valuable to the gentleman, and I think it will be something interesting before I get through. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to pursue further the question of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and his charges. I think, though, that they could be summed up in very simple language. There were the records to verify that I was here. There were the roll calls where I was registered as being here in the transaction of practically all the important business of the House. The gentleman has made specific charges which the facts do not substantiate. His charges are false and there is no excuse that I can see for making them so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come for me to tell my colleagues about this question of so-called absenteeism and the question of my lecturing, and then very briefly about my interpretation of my duty. I concede that each one of us has the right to interpret his own duty for himself. We are not schoolboys. Our duty is not that of answering roll calls. Our duty is not that of routine. Just a few weeks ago—four weeks ago—in Clay County during my campaign a country school was awarding its medals. They honored me by allowing me to pin the gold medals upon the breasts of five little pupils who went the whole winter season—one of them lived 5 miles away—during all the inclemency of the winter weather without missing a single roll call. They far outstripped even the gentleman from Connecticut in his record since the 7th of May in the matter of answering roll calls. I may mention incidentally here that I used to give in the olden days perhaps too much importance to roll calls and the letter rather than the spirit. If I remember correctly, I went through Annapolis four years and, with possibly one exception, I am not clear about it, but I think it was when I had a boil on my neck, I never missed one roll call or one practice exercise or anything else.

And the Government sent me abroad with other colleagues to take postgraduate work. I was three years in Paris with no one to report to, absolutely in the heart of that city without any superior officer. The Government thought well enough to trust me there, and I thought enough of the responsibility to go through with the record, that never once in those three years did I miss a single lecture or a single practical exercise. And I will tell, incidentally, my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] that it was over there that I was studying shipbuilding, marine engineering, and naval architecture. That is where I gathered the timbers for "the great naval constructor." But I do not know where I got the timbers that make me presidential size. I suppose the gentleman will locate those some of these days.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I say, we are not schoolboys. I think it is unfortunate that I practically am driven to tell my colleagues what my simple philosophy in life is. I believe that a man should render a maximum of useful service to his fellow man in his day and generation, and he alone, with his own conscience, being honest with himself, must work out what in his best judgment at various times will contribute that maximum. [Applause.]

I am trying to follow that little philosophy in my work in Congress. I put the important action of Congress first and foremost, and I would leave any occupation that I can think of, anywhere, to come and take part in this first duty where it affects important legislation for the country.

But I not only look upon this public office as a public trust, but I look upon it as an opportunity to serve. I have been doing my little best to try to get in the maximum of useful service during my career in this House. I know that I leave at times to lecture. I want my colleagues to know this, that I never fix a regular lecture tour in a regular session of Congress. My regular lecture period is confined to the chautauquas in the summer and to the lyceum in the autumn months when Congress is not in session. When there are extra sessions of Congress—as a rule it has been my experience thus far—there is special business to transact and that special business only, and that the House transacts that business first, and then marks time until the Senate follows. During that time I have looked upon it as though it were a recess of Congress, but always holding myself ready to come back at a moment's notice where anything important arises. Now, in regular sessions I sometimes go out for the Christmas holidays. That is the nearest to being a regular lecture trip. Not infrequently I go out at week ends, very rarely in the middle of the week, to make a special address on a special occasion.

Now, if my colleagues want to find out any more about my plans and my practices, I have kept a diary, which may be imperfect in some cases on account of cancellations, but I think on the whole I could tell them just where I was, and if anybody wants to know I will be glad to show him.

Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to have done much in my three completed terms in this House. I do not believe that my colleagues on the Naval Committee, when the essential work of that committee was being performed, would intimate that I had not done my duty there. I am on the subcommittee to prepare the naval appropriation bill. That is perhaps the most onerous bill of all the regular supply bills prepared by standing committees. It is always one of the last bills completed. I am chairman of the special subcommittee to conduct the difficult and intricate scientific investigations on ordnance matters, and not infrequently these matters take me away from Congress.

In the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress I had my little part in helping to frame a report and then passed the joint resolution for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people.

I have been chairman of three special investigating subcommittees of that committee. One of them was the Committee on Woman Suffrage. Some one said, "You will rue the day when you got on that committee." Well, Mr. Speaker, I will say this: We differ in judgment. My mind in any investigation of that kind remains open, but I simply want to announce here the general proposition that as I go along I make it a rule to try to find out the truth and not only to do it diligently, but in humiliation and prayerfully. It is hard to find it out, but I want to say that when I do find it out, I try to stand by it. [Applause.] Loyalty to the truth is the test of a man.

And I have been chairman of the special subcommittee to investigate the question of popular nomination of President and Vice President, also of a special subcommittee to investigate the question of direct election of President and Vice President. I do not believe my colleagues on the committee would say that I have not done my share of the committee's work.

Then on the Committee on Education, it is true, we had no chance to work collectively; it has been a more or less inactive committee; but I will say here that I have put in as hard work along that line, perhaps harder than in any line of investigation that I am trying to make. In fact, I am endeavoring, so far as I can, to help in my little way to have the machinery of this Government develop the educational side and in the end, without interfering with its political activities and operations, to become a great engine of education. It was with that idea that these expeditions were organized.

But, further than that, I am trying to bring about a condition where the Agricultural Department will not only issue the technical bulletins available to any, but will also conduct correspondence courses in scientific agriculture, so that any poor boy or any poor man in this country, without paying a cent, by merely giving his name in, can carry on a course of instruction and equip himself to become a scientific farmer.

I would also do what I could to bring about a condition whereby the Department of Commerce would conduct business courses, so that a poor boy or a poor man could take a business course of instruction. And I would have the Department of Labor conduct courses in the trades and mechanic arts, so that any wage earner, any poor man engaged in a trade, could learn from the hands of his Government, without cost, how to become skilled and expert.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Recalling a very pleasant and profitable trip that I took with the gentleman from Alabama, witnessing some armor tests, some months ago, I will ask the gentleman if he does not think his plan could be put into effect to a great deal of advantage among the enlisted men of the Navy, the men who are now paying out of their own pockets, out of their own wages, money for instruction in business courses, and so forth, and if some means could not be devised whereby the retired officers themselves could occupy their time in helping the young men instead of compelling those young men to spend their own money for that purpose?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; I am in accord with the gentleman as well as with his colleague from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] on that, and I am glad to say that the department now has under consideration the details of carrying that out. I believe that in both the military branches, the War Department and the Navy Department, opportunities should be opened up for the development of this educational side for the benefit of the American men enlisted in that service.

Now, I would also, so far as I can, help the Diplomatic and Consular Service of this country to develop a service so that our agents in all lands would gather vital information from all other countries bearing on the educational equipment of youth, especially vocational equipment, and other matters vital to the prosperity of the American people, and report these matters continually to the American Government; and if I could I would have a central bureau established here that would receive similar vital information every week from all the departments of the Government and would then issue weekly a report, as it were, to the American people on all the great vital facts of the previous week that bear upon their vocations, their health, and their welfare, making it in the nature of an official journal, so that any man, through his postmaster or by arrangement through his Congressman or in some other way, could get the best information the world has ever seen, free of cost, as a part, and an inexpensive part, of the educational work of this Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have other ambitions to try to be helpful in this educational work. It is a fact that if a boy goes to school only until he is 14 years of age, at the age of 25 he will be earning only $2 a day on the average; but if he goes to school until he is 16 years of age, then at the age of 25 he will actually be earning $4 a day on the average. No brighter than the first boy, he begins work two years later; and yet, as a result of only two years of additional schooling that second boy is able to catch up with the first boy, to pass him, and double him by the time they are 25. Mr. Speaker, the nation that helps to add two years more to the average school period of the rising generation is the nation that is going to capture the commerce and the markets of the world in the next generation.

To-day 97 per cent of the American children do not attain to the full age of 14 years before they leave school. I am told that there are two and one-half million American children below the age of 12 who are working for a daily wage. Of the boys who go to the common school only and go no further only 1 boy out of 9,000 will ever attain a place among the 10,000 men who are the actual leaders in all the walks of life. Out of the boys who go through high school 1 out of every 400 will attain that leadership. The four years more of training at the plastic period increases twenty-two fold the equipment of that citizen and his chances of leadership. And of those who go to college 1 boy out of every 40 will become one of these great leaders.

To-day the American Nation is confined to 3 per cent of its people from whom to recruit its leaders, because of the lack of education. See the inequality it works. Ninety-seven per cent of the bright boys of this country, with good blood in their veins, get a chance to go to common school only. The remaining 3 per cent go to college—boys with no better blood in their veins and boys who are no brighter. While we in this Republic, founded upon the principle of equality, discuss this equality in theory and split hairs about it, the actual test of practice shows that in the lives of our citizens the second boys have 220 times the chances of becoming leaders that the first boys have. Thus the doors of highest opportunity are closed to 97 per cent of our people. Three per cent of the American people have a monopoly of the highest opportunities.

Perhaps gentlemen will understand my idea on the subject when I go a little further. This question of the development of youth in the plastic period is unquestionably the great question of this age and all ages. You can not change a man much after he gets beyond that period, but you can do wonders in that period, as I have just illustrated by these great and astounding facts.

Mr. Speaker, if we wish best to insure that this Nation of ours shall successfully stand the shocks that may come upon it in generations to come through the problems confronting us in the economic and industrial world, the best way to insure our meeting those problems successfully is to raise the standard of education.

If I were to state what I regard as the best way to enable America to meet the industrial competition of Germany and those nations that are scientifically and systematically developing their children, a way to meet them in competition in the markets of the world—in fact, to meet the dangers, even, in the armies in future generations—I would say raise the average standard of education for the rising generation.

If I were asked to state what would guarantee that our Republic should endure, that liberty and free institutions shall not perish from the earth, I would say insure against debauchery, insure for a high average standard of education of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell on that now; I have gone more into it than I intended, but the gentleman asked some pertinent questions that incited me. I simply want to point out that in this Committee on Education I have been doing hard work.

I have drawn several bills, I believe, of a constructive nature, to bring about a condition where this matter of an average standard of education of the people, being vital to the Nation as it is to the State, county, or family, being closely allied to the principle of self-preservation, a legitimate field for the Federal Government, shall be taken in hand by the Federal Government, with its vast resources unmatched by individual States. There is a vital, constructive, progressive field and domain where the Federal Government ought to help establish a standard of education for the Nation and then encourage the States and counties to all work toward that standard. Then when they do so work I believe that the Federal Government, without giving any board or any agency the authority to go into a State and to interfere with its machinery of education, should be willing to bear, say, one-third of the cost, that the State should bear the second third, and that the county or locality should contribute the third third.

I pass now to the point of answering what the gentleman said about roll calls. Mr. Speaker, you understand perfectly well, and Members here also, that because a Member does not answer a roll call it does not mean that he is away from Washington and neglecting his duty. I have a session pair every year, and that session pair was gotten up not only to protect my party and vote when I was away from Washington, but also to enable me to better attend to duty of the moment in my committee or in the department work. Now, I will give you an illustration. My friend from Alabama, the floor leader, is on a great committee, and perhaps, without speaking invidiously, I would be pardoned if I said that in my judgment it is the greatest Ways and Means Committee that has been in this House since I have had the honor to be a Member. It is but once in a decade that it frames a great bill. And permit me to say also, Mr. Speaker, that there were some things in this last bill that I would have voted against if I had had a chance; but as a whole I regard that bill as the greatest piece of constructive legislation not only since my short service in this House but perhaps since the foundation of this Government. Now, my friend's committee has a bill to construct about once in a decade. My committee, the Committee on Naval Appropriations, has a bill carrying around $140,000,000 to construct every year. When his committee was engaged in the construction of its bill my friend was absent from the floor of the House continually, as near as I remember. For weeks and weeks he did not answer a single roll call, and I do not think he ought to have answered a single roll call. I commend his attention to duty in his committee.

I want to ask my friend from Connecticut or any other gentleman not to assume, for the past or for the future, that because I may not answer roll calls I am absent, but that they look up and see where I actually am before they assume that I am neglecting my duty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude that part of my remarks by saying that I was brought up in the Navy. They teach you in the Navy to do your duty first. Gen. Lee gave Annapolis and West Point a little motto embraced in the observation that "duty is the greatest word in the English language." Now, I am not talking lightly; I think it is unfortunate that I should have to talk in this way at all.

I lived for two years at Annapolis in complete ostracism because I interpreted the duty of a cadet put on duty as officer of the day to report his classmates just as he reports anyone else. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I went to the Spanish War not as an ordinary duty. My routine duty was at Annapolis. I was in charge of the post-graduate course there, but my little philosophy had led me to believe I might render temporarily more service at the front, and I went. It was extra duty. I will say to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] that I suppose he knows what a naval constructor is. If he is thoroughly familiar, he will know this, that a naval constructor never has to command a ship. I was a naval constructor in that war. I knew how to build a ship. I felt that I knew how to sink a ship. I sought the extra duty. I sank the ship. I will say to my friend from Connecticut that here in Congress this work of special expeditions in my district is not routine work. I have sought to do it as extra duty.

I will say to him further that in the course of my educational investigation I found that, in my judgment, the true solution of our greatest national ill, that of the liquor question, lies in education. This element of truth has led me into very difficult paths. Mr. Speaker, you may drink yourself—I know individually that you do not, and I want to congratulate you a thousand times and say God bless you for the man you have been—but, speaking figuratively, you may drink yourself, but if you are a good man you do not want your boy to grow up drinking, nor even your neighbor's boy. Mr. Speaker, you may be wet in your politics, and I will not criticize you. I try to be as broad as the horizon. There are good men who believe that on this matter things ought to be wide open. There are other good men who believe there ought to be regulation in various forms. There are other men who believe there ought to be local option in various forms. There are still others who believe there ought to be prohibition in various forms. I do not think this is essential, because, pass what law you please, you are not going to change the old drinkers very much. They are going on until they die. It is too late to change the old, but you can shape the young. Here is the vital matter. You may be wet in your politics, but if you are a good citizen and a good man you would love to see the young people of this country grow up sober. Is not that true? Then let us all join to bring up the next generation of Americans to be sober, and we can do it by molding them in the plastic period with the truth on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I can not obtain the use of the antagonistic press, particularly those papers that carry large advertising contracts with the liquor interests. I can not get anything of the truth on this subject to help educate the American youth.

I can not get access to the press, but while I am in Congress I can get access to governmental machinery, and I have put the truth about alcohol into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the form of a speech, called The Great Destroyer. I have not thrust my ideas upon Members, but for many years I have been trying to do my little part to help mold the rising youth of this country. Yes; I lecture, Mr. Speaker, and I command a big fee, and, barring yourself and the Secretary of State, as I remember, it is the biggest fee paid, and there is demand for more than all of my time; and I will say to those who imagine that I am mercenary in it, that I can make three to four times as much out of Congress as the salary amounts to.

Mr. Speaker, I have used my substance, and some good friends believing in my work have helped me, and I have mailed 2,000,000 copies of that speech, not to the old people, who may throw it aside, upon whom it could have had but little effect, but I have mailed it systematically to the youth of this land—to all of the college boys, many in the high schools and the graduate schools, and to all of the teachers—and I find this: That a personal letter to a boy at an impressionable age from a Member of Congress has a powerful effect. I have written a million and a half personal letters to the youth of this country upon that subject. This work of mine, which I know every good man must indorse, has led me into many troubles. It has begun to affect, I believe, the national view of this great question. I believe it is causing the divergent elements to come to recognize that they can all get together on the educational proposition.

And it bids fair in the course of time to help solve this great question. Let all the good forces of the Nation cooperate and we will surely bring up a sober race in America. As I say, I do not regard the law as everything, but this is an infectious disease. Taking human nature as it is, if you have it in your presence you will drink it; a drinking boy will contaminate the others; wet territory will contaminate dry. That is human nature. When we have finally put this organic disease out of the body it must be kept out. I believe that is simply scientific. In the end, when we have brought up the race to be sober—and we will attain that end because drinkers die off and are not recruited—we will proceed to put prohibition into the Constitution of the United States. I have ventured simply in a scientific way to draw a joint resolution to that effect.

Mr. Speaker, since this work of mine I find I can not make a political campaign like other Members, but find the heavy and brutal hand of the liquor interests raised to destroy me politically. Last year, when I went into my district and asked my constituents to return me, I found the hand of the liquor interests there. Now, I weigh every word I say, and I know exactly what I am talking about. They fought behind one of the best men in my district, one of the most upright, who is known as the father of prohibition. They had a huge corruption fund there. Again I say, I know what I am talking about, for indictments and confessions have been made. One check alone was for $20,000. They had space, Mr. Speaker, in every paper, not only in the district there but in the cosmopolitan press, and used it to say mean things about me, and among the mean things are the same things that are now coming up here about the charges that I am away and neglecting my duty because not answering unimportant roll calls.

They tried also to say that I believed in negroes mixing with white people and in negro domination, because one bright morning here in the House the question came up whether the Brownsville matter was to be opened up or not. There had never been a trial of any kind. The investigation might lead to a trial

I voted for the bill. I said that if they were guilty, they should hang; if they were innocent, they should be exonerated, white or black. [Applause.] They used that with other malicious defamations against me. And they had the speakers, Mr. Speaker. They turned 25 speakers loose in my district on me and I was single-handed. They organized them into flying squadrons. Before we got through with them we called them the "fleeing" squadrons, but that is what they called them, flying squadrons—25 speakers. Well, when I went to my constituents my constituents answered by quadrupling my majority. Mr. Speaker, several conferences were held prior to that campaign, and, incidentally, I was attacked on the floor of this House just prior to that campaign just as I have now been attacked here again, and in those conferences I had a report that the politicians, gathered from all parts of the State, were trying to find a way "to beat Hobson for Congress." Mr. Speaker, when Senator Johnston's untimely death, mourned by all Alabamians, brought about the question of his successor, politicians gathered in Birmingham in a similar way from all parts of the State. They held their caucuses at the Morris Hotel, morning, afternoon, and night. Members who took part—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not think so. I thought I had 10 minutes more. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. Members taking part in that caucus came and told me direct from the caucus, and they spoke it on the street, that the politicians were trying to find a way not to carry out the practice of the Democratic Party in Alabama by a call of a primary to choose a Democratic candidate at the hands of the people, and not to bring about a general election under the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution by which the people could elect, but how to find a way "to beat Hobson for the Senate."

There is a distinguished editor in Birmingham—Mr. Glass—one of the greatest editors in the State, if not the greatest. He, in a way, is spokesman for the administration and he took part in those conferences. Here is an editorial by Mr. Glass the day after the appointment of my friend Mr. CLAYTON. I will read a part of it:

A number of the most astute politicians in the State pressed with the greatest energy the view upon the governor that he should appoint a man who could cope with Mr. Hobson for the permanent place; that the most available man should be pitted now, so that he might be groomed and strengthened as the representative of the local optionists for the coming struggle with Mr. Hobson as the leader of the prohibition element. There seems little doubt that this was the view that prevailed, and upon which Gov. O'Neal acted.

Now then, later Mr. Glass, this editor, in another editorial, says:

Nevertheless it was Mr. Glass's judgment from the very start that if a candidate was to be put in training to beat Mr. Hobson, Mr. UNDERWOOD was preeminently the man.—Birmingham News.

This was soon followed by a call from the News that my friend Mr. UNDERWOOD should enter the race.

In the Washington Star of October 12, under the heading "Willing to remain Member of House," the following occurs, referring to the President's request upon my friend Mr. CLAYTON:

The letters were made public after several days of conference in which the President, Gov. O'Neal, former Gov. W. D. Jelks, and other Alabama political leaders took part. The entire subject of the Alabama senatorial situation was gone over.

And amongst those was Mr. Glass.

I have a special edition of Mr. Glass's paper when he wired this from Washington, saying the President had just handed him a copy of the letter. So I assumed he was present. It is assumed that he came to Washington on the same business as the governor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to an attack upon me by an anonymous Member of Congress. It appears in the Birmingham Age-Herald from its Washington correspondent. It is dated October 10, 1913, under the head:

Hobson's attack regarded as joke by Congressmen—Georgian asks why he supported UNDERWOOD for Presidency—Republicans admit leader's integrity—"How can Hobson know more of UNDERWOOD than we who work with him?" question asked.

Now, this is under a Washington headline of October 9. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who this anonymous Congressman is. I assume that only an unimportant Congressman would give out that kind of an interview anonymously. I hope the gentleman is here. I would be glad to know if he is. If I had known his identity, I would have asked him to be present, as I asked my colleague from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] to be present. The article is as follows:

"It is indeed strange that Capt. HOBSON, who spends so little of his valuable time in Washington, has found out more about OSCAR UNDERWOOD than those of us who see him and are with him every day," said a Georgia Member to-day.

"It is also strange that if Capt. HOBSON knew all these dark and evil things that he so earnestly supported Mr. UNDERWOOD for the Presidency, unless perhaps he thought it was the popular thing for him to do with all Alabamians."

I assume that the gentleman is quoting from the reports of a speech of mine made at Wetumpka last Monday. I want to say at the outset that the correspondent who was there is a correspondent of a hostile paper; that reports of what I did really say there have been very much misrepresented. I also will remark incidentally, though, that even if these reports had been what the reporter alleges they were, I hope all fair men will recognize that the charges or the references were made not on the eve of an election but on the day after an announcement. I indulged in no mud slinging, no reflections upon Mr. UNDERWOOD's character, but paid him a tribute. What I did say is based on the sworn testimony, which I will now read, on pages 937 and 938 of the Senate hearings on the campaign-contributions investigation, Senate committee:

Senator BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I undertook the management of Mr. UNDERWOOD's campaign, and I want to say to the committee that I assume the whole responsibility. Mr. UNDERWOOD knew nothing of any of the contributions nor how any of it was expended. I am responsible for the whole thing.

And then, in putting in the evidence his detailed statement, he cites:

Contributions to O. W. UNDERWOOD's campaign for the presidential nomination, Thomas F. Ryan, $35,000.

And then he quotes others of smaller dimensions.

Mr. Speaker, in the late stages of the preliminary campaign for choosing delegates to the Baltimore convention Mr. Bryan, editor of the Commoner, in his issue of May 10, 1912, under the head "The game exposed," makes the following statement:

The campaign has now progressed far enough to enable the Democratic voters to know the methods that are being employed by the Wall Street crowd to capture the Baltimore convention. Mr. Harmon and Mr. UNDERWOOD are the reactionary candidates.

That is not my statement, Mr. Speaker. That is the statement of William Jennings Bryan, and however men may differ with Mr. Bryan's political policies I have yet to see a man who doubts his integrity, his honesty, and his truthfulness.

I proceed to quote from Mr. Bryan:

Mr. Harmon was picked out first, but the "big" business began to smile on Mr. UNDERWOOD as soon as it became evident that Mr. Harmon was not making headway as a candidate. They have now divided up the territory in which they think a reactionary has a chance, and Mr. Harmon is running in a few States in the North and Mr. UNDERWOOD in six States in the South.

I think I am not out of etiquette to say that this statement of Mr. Bryan had been made to me several weeks before and I practically challenged him and told him before we left the board—we were taking breakfast together—that I was for OSCAR UNDERWOOD. I had told President Wilson the same thing—he is now President; he was then governor—that while I was in accord with his progressive policies, I proposed to support Alabama's candidate, OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD.

Finally the charges were being made publicly that Mr. UNDERWOOD's candidacy was being financed from Wall Street. Vehement denials were made on the part of his management. I did not know what to think, and in Alabama I gave out a statement that no Alabamian had more State pride than I had, or would more gladly and more loyally support Mr. UNDERWOOD, but I made a statement in the presence of Editor Glass—he was vigorously attacking Mr. UNDERWOOD at the time and accusing him, with Mr. Harmon, of being the tool of Mr. Ryan—the same Mr. Glass to whom I made this statement, in his presence to his own reporter, a stenographic statement, that I did not propose to submit, and that the State would not submit, to Wall Street's game being worked behind OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD.

The vehement denials on the part of his management at last allayed my fears, and I supported Mr. UNDERWOOD.

This anonymous Member of Congress asks why I did; how could OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD get my support? Mr. Speaker, my support and the support of the loyal Democrats and the progressive citizens of Alabama was obtained under false pretenses. Had I known that Thomas Fortune Ryan, the man whom Mr. Bryan rebuked and named at the Baltimore convention and accused of being the tool of Wall Street and of trying to capture the party in the interest of Wall Street was financing the major part of the campaign of OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, not only would I not have supported him, but I would have fought him; and, what is more, he never would have been the choice of the people of Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, the support of the people of Alabama was secured for Mr. UNDERWOOD for the Presidency under false pretenses. I here declare that their support of him for the United States Senate shall not be similarly obtained under false pretenses.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. It is two minutes yet, Mr. Speaker. I was watching it.

The SPEAKER. These clocks are not very reliable.

Mr. HOBSON. I am closing, and I know no one objects.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBSON. And I want to say to this anonymous Congressman and to the one who went down with the funeral party of Senator JOHNSTON and could not wait until the remains were buried before he made a vicious attack on me—and I want to say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], and I want to say to any gentleman who injects himself into this campaign in Alabama—that the right of Alabama to choose her own Senator without dictation from the outside is a constitutional right, and that the right of the people of Alabama to choose their Senator is likewise a constitutional right, and neither the gentlemen that I have mentioned nor any other gentleman who may appear with them can terrify these free citizens of Alabama. My friend Mr. UNDERWOOD may not know the people of Alabama; but I know them, for I was born among them, and the blood of my father and of my uncles and of my people stains the soil there. Yes; those people are simple people living close to nature; they are sober, they are God-fearing; but, Mr. Speaker, they are courageous and undaunted. They are the same men that met at Mecklenburg and drew the indictment of a king. They never submitted to dictation from a king. They will submit to dictation in their children to-day from no one in this world. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that Alabama politics should be dragged to the floor of this House; but no man has an asset more valuable in his life than his good name, and when his good name is challenged, no matter where it may be, he must meet the issue; and it is with that apology to my colleagues that I rise to speak of local issues in the State of Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, I saw in the public press of Alabama a statement some days ago that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] had stated in a public speech and in public interviews that I was a tool of Wall Street and a tool of the liquor interests. I have waited patiently to answer that charge until I could look Capt. HOBSON in the face and challenge the truthfulness of the statement.

Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama to say here—because I was not in Alabama, and I do not want to misquote him—if he made the statement; and if not, I ask him to deny it.

Mr. HOBSON. I shall be very glad—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask him to say now did he charge me in his Wetumpka speech or anywhere else in Alabama with being a tool of Wall Street or a tool of the liquor interests?

Mr. HOBSON. I will tell the gentleman. I used the double word, and I will tell him exactly what the double word was and how I used it. I read the testimony which I have just read. I assumed that what Senator BANKHEAD said under oath was true—that Mr. UNDERWOOD did not know that his campaign in Georgia, Mississippi, and other States was financed by Wall Street.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman knows that I did not know of Mr. Ryan's contribution to my campaign fund, as Senator BANKHEAD did.

Mr. HOBSON. I am glad that the gentleman will make that statement now. I asked the people of Alabama, and I ask him now, when the charge had been made publicly why did not my friend and the people's friend at least look at the books and find out, and then with that preface—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman not to take up my time in making a speech. I am trying to get him to answer whether he did make the charge or not.

Mr. HOBSON. I am trying to state it. I am leading up to it so you will understand it, as well as the others. I said that if Senator BANKHEAD's testimony is correct, and my friend admits it, if he did not know he should have known. Why did he not know? But, not knowing, I stated, and I repeat it, he was, in effect, but a dummy in the hands of managers, being used as he was used. I did not charge that he or his managers were corrupt or made any deal with Wall Street, and I do not charge that he himself or his managers now in this campaign have any direct deal or connection with the liquor interests; but I say he was a dummy, being used as their tool, and that a dummy who could be used as a tool by Wall Street could likewise, as a dummy, be used as a tool by the liquor interests or any other interests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to get the gentleman's statement correctly, because I will answer him about being a tool and about being used. But I want it understood. The gentleman says he did not charge me directly with being a tool of Wall Street or the liquor interests, but it was based on the supposition that Mr. Ryan had made this contribution, and if I was being used by somebody else that I did not know it. Is that it?

Mr. HOBSON. It is just as I say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, will the gentleman answer me?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say this—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did you say—

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; I am glad to say it—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did you say that I was a tool of the liquor interests or of Wall Street, or not?

Mr. HOBSON. I say you were a dummy in that campaign.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You did not use the other expression?

Mr. HOBSON. And that as a dummy you were used.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All right. Now, I want to answer—

Mr. HOBSON. And that if you were a dummy now you could be used again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman one more question. I want the fact on which he bases his statement. A while ago he said he sought the truth when he got into a controversy. Now, is there any evidence that you have got of anything in my public or private career on which you based that charge when you made it? If there is, state it here.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to be very correctly understood, I want to say to the gentleman—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will wait a minute.

Mr. HOBSON. I am going to answer the gentleman, but not in his way.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman has no right to interrupt the other without his consent.

Mr. HOBSON. Oh, but the gentleman from Alabama has requested me to answer him. My answer is this: I have stated and now I repeat it, that I would resent any man's statement who would make it with an intent to reflect upon my friend's integrity, who would impute the slightest moral turpitude to the gentleman from Alabama. I believe he has done his duty as he has seen it. But my interpretation was this, and I stick to it, that the gentleman is simply of a type of politician that has reigned but is to be dethroned, and a type that plays the game, and allows to come into the game agencies that help to win. Without any reflection upon his moral integrity or his character, I make that statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, another question. The gentleman not only charged me with being the tool of Wall Street, and he bases that entirely on Mr. Ryan's contribution to my campaign fund, but he charged me with being a tool of the liquor interests. I want to know if there is anything else upon which he based that charge.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to say to the gentleman that I have not made that charge except in this way. What I said was, and I do not exonerate him from it, I say that the liquor interests conspired to defeat me in my district, and put up one politician after another, until at last they found the strongest one. I say now that I believe that is what they are doing in this fight. I am not charging the gentleman from Alabama with anything, but I did charge and do charge that if he could be used as a dummy in one election he could be used as a dummy in another.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to this House that no man and no interest, no matter how great or important, has ever used me as a tool or a dummy. [Great applause on the Democratic side.] Not only the men on the floor of this House but the people of the United States from ocean to ocean have seen me placed in positions where temptations and powerful interests were rolled upon me to yield to influences, and I challenge any man, no matter who he may be, to point to a single blot on my public or private career. [Applause.]

I have just returned to this House a great bill placed in my hands by my party that in years gone by has been subject to those influences, and yet I challenge the gentleman from Alabama or any other man here to show that any influence has been used in my administration of that public trust.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I think it is right to supplement the statement I made a while ago. It bears upon this point. The charge I did make in regard to the liquor interests—and I want to repeat it now and I would like for the gentleman from Alabama to correct me if I am wrong—is substantially as follows. I said three things, as I remember: First, that the gentleman was on the fence in our amendment fight there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was untrue. The gentleman from Alabama may not have known where I stood, but everybody else did. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOBSON. I did not know it. I will refer that to the people of Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that there can be no controversy about it, because, although the gentleman from Alabama has been known as a prohibitionist in the liquor fight to amend the constitution of Alabama for State-wide prohibition, I was the first Member of Congress that came out and stated that I was a local optionist and not for State-wide prohibition. That was published in the daily press of my own city months before the election took place.

Mr. HOBSON. That may be; I had not seen it, as the gentleman took no part in the fight. But that is not material. My point was that you did finally vote on that side, as a great many good men did without being liquor men themselves.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not vote for State-wide prohibition. There is no contest about that.

Mr. HOBSON. And in the contest in Birmingham and Jefferson County, the same, you voted wet. But that was only leading up to the statement I made and that I now make, that in the meetings of the conference committee on the tariff bill I am informed that the gentleman was consistently opposed to Senate amendments that would reduce the revenue, he regarding the question of maintaining the revenues as one of great importance, so that the bill would have no chance to produce a deficit, but that when he reached the amendment—I think it is called the Pomereene amendment—which repeals the clause in the tariff act of 1890 that exempts manufacturers of wine from paying the usual tax of $1.10 on brandies, although that amendment would have increased the revenue of the Government about $7,250,000, to the surprise of the members of the committee the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] turned right around and fought the amendment, the result of which is to take out of the Treasury about $7,250,000 and transfer it into the hands of these liquor men, and the general result is to increase the amount of alcohol in the wine.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And on that basis the gentleman charges that I am the tool of the Liquor Trust?

Mr. HOBSON. I make this statement, that you did this, and that as a result the liquor interests are seven and a quarter million dollars better off than if you had concurred in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well. I will ask the gentleman now to permit me to proceed. I am obliged to him for answering the question, because I wanted him to come right out, where I can look him in the eye, and say what he has to say. So far as the Pomereene amendment is concerned, if we had passed the amendment as it stood in the bill it would have seriously affected the pure-food laws of the country, so far as they related to wine.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish. I told the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] that very same thing sitting right here before the conference report was voted on. The gentleman will recall that I told him that.

Mr. HOBSON. Before the gentleman leaves that proposition, will he permit me to ask him a question, because it is germane?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. HOBSON. My contention is not that the whole amendment should have been retained. My contention is that you could have left all of the pure-food part of it as a legitimate compromise with the Senate and simply have removed the revenue part, to increase the revenue seven and a quarter million.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, that might have been done if we needed the revenue from that point. We had reached a point where we found we had, according to our estimates, a surplus of $18,000,000 of revenue. We knew that that amendment challenged the pure-food laws of this country. In other words, it taxed out of existence, practically out of existence, wine made out of grape brandy, that was pure wine, and left sweet wines to be preserved with benzoate of soda, which were impure wines. I will tell the gentleman from Alabama something; he is not informed on this question or he would not be so earnestly in favor of the passage of the amendment. I remember 10 years ago, when this same controversy occurred between the wine growers of California and these men from Ohio, who were standing behind this amendment.

One of the men from California before the Committee on Ways and Means challenged the Ohio man and said, "Your wine is impure, and the laws of Ohio will not let you sell it there." I then asked him where he was selling this impure wine, and he said it was down South—in the country that you and I hail from, sending poisoned wine to poison our people. The gentleman from Alabama is a prohibitionist, and he is conscientious in it. I do not challenge his position, but if wine is to be sold, does he want to poison the people who drink it or does he want pure wine sold to the people who drink it? [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman be good enough to yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield, but not for a speech.

Mr. HOBSON. This is all afieled from the question. If you would leave out all of the pure-food regulations, it was merely a question of revenue. It is not a question of the Ohio wines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the gentleman fully. When it turned out it was not necessary to have that revenue and that there was a serious issue involving the pure-food laws of this country, one that required careful investigation and could not be gone into by tired men in a few hours, I agreed to give these men a full and ample hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means next winter, when both sides could be heard and the proper legislation could be obtained; and if the gentleman had read the RECORD and had been here and had kept in touch with what was going on, he would know that that was the situation. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this, if the gentleman will allow me: I do not want to prevent him interrupting me, but I have but a short time. Mr. Speaker, I have had over 18 years of service in the Congress. My record has been an open one. Without criticizing other Members for what they may do, I wish to say to this House that during that 18 years of service I have never left my duty here either to go home to take part in political campaigns or to go on the lecture field to make speeches to earn additional money for myself. During that 18 years when the Congress has been in session I have not left this House to go home, except when it was either in recess or partial recess, but five times, and of those five times one of them was due to a death in my family and the other four times on account of sickness. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I have sought conscientiously to do my duty here. There is no record vote that has been dodged by me.

The record is here for inspection, and I challenge the gentleman from Alabama or anyone else, after a careful search of 18 years of record, to point to a single instance where I have been the tool of Wall Street, of the liquor interests, or of anybody else. [Applause.] If I have been the tool of Wall Street or of the liquor interests, then the Democratic Party has been the tool of Wall Street and the liquor interests, because my record is the record of the Democratic Party in 18 years of service. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield just to allow me to correct an impression?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman referred to my speaking to him in connection with the Senate amendment. I came and tried to arrange a way to take that particular question out and vote on it separately. It was only because it was embedded in the Senate report that it could not be voted on, and the gentleman can not say the Democratic Party stands for it simply because it stood in the tariff bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the members of the Democratic Party on that issue stood for it, and I have not a doubt, and I challenge anybody to say that if I had come on the floor of the House with it as a separate amendment and stated the facts to my colleagues here that it was ill advised and we were not ready to proceed to legislate, they would not have turned it down. The gentlemen may not, but the Democratic Party would. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I want to say this—

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman did not give us a chance, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman knows conference reports are not written that way, and does he not do the same thing on the naval appropriation bills? The conferees agree to everything that it is possible to agree to, and only matters of dispute are brought in separately, and the gentleman knows that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this: The gentleman has charged that my delegations from Alabama and the other Southern States to the last national convention were gotten there by fraud and misrepresentation—

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? This matter is fundamental.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, state it.

Mr. HOBSON. I made no such charge. I said they were obtained under false pretenses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is the same thing; they were obtained under false pretenses. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama and my colleagues here that at the time this presidential campaign came on I had been selected to perform a great duty for the Democratic Party—that is, to attempt to pass through the House tariff bills that would challenge the attention of the American people—that would give us a basis for the campaign for the Presidency that we were about to undertake.

Some of them had already been passed through the House. They had challenged the attention of some American people, and friends of mine had asked me to become a candidate for the Presidency. At first I refused. They became insistent, and then I stated to them—and I stated it publicly in the prints of the country—that if I became a candidate it must be on condition that I should be allowed to stay here in my place [applause on the Democratic side], doing my duty to my party and my country and take no part in that campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I did it. I did not leave here one time to make a speech for myself, because my party was on the firing line. I took no part in the campaign.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me now for a few minutes. I took no part in the campaign that was being waged by my friends. I was in the headquarters of my campaign committee, I think, just three times during that entire campaign. I kept my pledge to my party and my country, and I labored industriously to try to make a platform upon which the Democracy could carry the country and that the great principles of the Democratic Party might again be written on the statute books. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson], because I did and because I did not know who contributed to my campaign fund, says that I am a tool of the interests or a dummy that can not be depended upon. Is there any other man here, the men who intrusted me with my commission to lead the party in the last Congress and in this—is there any other man in this Congress, except the gentleman from Alabama, who is willing to rise in his seat here and say that because I did my duty in this House to the country I should now be penalized?

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman now yield to a question? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me now.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] has the right to ask his colleague [Mr. Underwood] to yield, and the latter has a right to say whether he will yield or not, and it is none of the business of the House whether they do or do not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. That would go to the heart of it, Mr. Underwood.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman says he wants to ask me one question in order to go to the heart of the matter, and I will be glad to let him do it.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask no more questions against the wishes of the gentleman. It is simply this, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman went down to his headquarters one of those three times, which he seems to have done consistently with his great duties here in the House, after the charge was made publicly that Wall Street was financing his campaign, does not he think he might have taken one minute during the visit to look at the books and see if that charge were true?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama I did not hear any charge made that Wall Street was financing my campaign. I did hear, after the delegates had gotten to Baltimore, a charge made that I was a Wall Street candidate, and that was the first time I heard it. And that charge was untrue. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I never was.

Now, subsequent to the election and after the printed campaign contributions had been made, I was told by the manager of my campaign that Mr. Ryan made the contribution to my campaign without asking any commitments as to any policy in that convention or by myself, saying it was given solely because he was a southern man and he was anxious to see a southern man elected to the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is no unusual thing for these rich men to make such contributions. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] charge that Col. Roosevelt was a tool of the interests because George Perkins subscribed to his campaign fund? Does he charge that the President of the United States is a tool of the interests because Mr. McCormick subscribed to his campaign fund in the presidential campaign? Does he charge that he is a tool of the interests? There was not a single candidate for the presidential nomination on either side whose campaign fund had not been subscribed to in part, at least, by men coming from New York, and men as intimately connected with the doings of Wall Street as Mr. Ryan was.

Mr. HOBSON. Of course, the gentleman knows that President Wilson scorned Ryan. I say that out of justice to him, Mr. Speaker. He scorned Ryan's contribution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I do not say that Mr. Roosevelt is the tool of the interests. I do not say that Mr. Wilson is, because I regard him as one of the great statesmen of America, and I have been here day in and day out for seven months laboriously struggling to hold up his hands and the policies of his administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] will never get the President of the United States to agree with his statement that I am a tool of the interests, liquor or otherwise [applause on the Democratic side], because the President of the United States knows where I stand and what I have fought for. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as to Mr. Bryan's statement in Baltimore—

Mr. HOBSON. This was in the Commoner on the 12th of May—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or in The Commoner. Everybody knows that at one time there was a serious disagreement between Mr. Bryan and myself. The membership of this House did not take Mr. Bryan's side on that occasion, and the country has not done so. Mr. Bryan was in a position at one time where he challenged and criticized nearly everything I did. I am not going into a discussion about Mr. Bryan at this time. We have forgotten our differences for the good of our party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I challenge the gentleman from Alabama to-day to get a statement from Mr. Bryan saying that I am the tool of any interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman knows very well he could not do it.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. If a gentleman desires to interrupt another gentleman, he must rise in his seat.

Mr. HOBSON. Let the gentleman change the form of that, and I will accept his challenge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My challenge is very clear, and what I mean is very distinctly understood. Mr. Bryan knows that I have done my duty here, that I have served my party and my country, and as a truthful, honest, God-fearing man he would not make such a charge at the behest of anybody. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I want the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] not to hang his charges against me on matters that he admits I did not know about; not to hang his charges on me with a statement such as he could charge every other candidate in the field with the same improper motive. More than that, the constituencies that sent the delegations for me from Mississippi and Alabama and Georgia and Florida—

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman is not fair to the other candidates.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that when a gentleman wants to interrupt a gentleman who has the floor he must rise and address the Chair and ask permission to interrupt.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask permission, then, Mr. Speaker, in order that the other candidates may not misunderstand my position. I ask the gentleman to give me permission to ask one question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOBSON. It is simply to prevent me from putting the gentleman in the same category as the others, because Mr. Wilson knew about his campaign contributions, and he took occasion to scorn Mr. Ryan's and others.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether the President understood about Mr. Ryan's campaign contribution to his campaign or not, but others were just as close to Wall Street as Mr. Ryan was.

But I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker, that the delegations from Alabama and the other Southern States did not go to that convention under any false pretenses. They went there to support a candidate in whose integrity and honesty and Democracy they believed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that no matter who subscribed to the campaign fund, neither he nor anybody else can challenge, either before or after that convention, the honesty or character or integrity of the candidate that Alabama and Mississippi and Georgia and Florida supported at that convention. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have endeavored as the floor leader of this House, under the responsibilities that have been thrown upon me, to honestly represent my constituents and honestly and faithfully perform a public duty here. Is it necessary for Alabama or Mississippi or Georgia or Florida to be ashamed of the duty I have performed here? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A MEMBER. Not a bit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would they have been ashamed had they succeeded and had placed me in the White House if I had performed my duty in the same way? It was not campaign contributions they were voting for. The gentleman is mistaken. They were voting for a man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: Whenever anybody has opposed the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, if I recollect aright, he has always charged that they are a tool of the liquor interests. I want to say to the gentleman that during the ten terms for which I have been elected to the Congress of the United States nobody has ever subscribed to my congressional campaign fund except myself or my own family; that I have never sought the support of any liquor interest or any other interest. More than that, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] himself knows that the principal issue on which the prohibitionists and the antiprohibitionists were contending in this Congress was the question of an antishipping bill. He knows that in years past I always voted for it, and he knows, because I told him in the last Congress, that I was not going to precipitate the issue of that vote in this House immediately before an election, but that I would stand for it and secure it immediately after an election. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] knows that I did so; that my influence on this floor and in the committee was used to secure a vote on that bill; that when it came before the House I voted for it and supported it; and it was the one bill that the liquor interests of this country did not want to see become a law. When a local community determines not to have liquor sold the only possibility of securing temperance is not to allow somebody else to ship it in there. [Applause.] The gentleman knows that, and he knows that not more than 15 months ago I supported that bill and stood for it. Yet he would imply to the people of Alabama, because I happened to be a candidate against him for the Senatorship from my State, that I have become a tool of the liquor interests. Mr. Speaker, as I have told the gentleman before, I challenge him to find anything in my record that I can not stand for or anything to indicate that I have ever been subservient to any interest in all this land.

If I wanted to be unkind—and I do not state it, because I believe the gentleman has convictions on the subject—but if I wanted to be unkind—

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman has my perfect consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] must observe the rule and the good sense of the rule.

Mr. HOBSON. I did not intend my remark to be heard except by the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I wanted to be unkind, I could point to the fact that during the entire term of the service of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] he has supported all the propositions and the propaganda of the great shipbuilding interests of this country that have ever been brought on this floor—all of them. [Applause.] Now, I do not charge an ulterior motive to the gentleman, because I believe he is honest in it; but with far more ground for making the charge than he has had for the charges he has made against me I could charge him with being a tool of the shipbuilding interests, which I do not. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HOBSON. I want the gentleman to be on record as declining to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman wishes to ask me a question, I will yield. What is the question?

Mr. HOBSON. It is merely whether he ever heard of any of the shipbuilding interests contributing anything to any campaign of mine?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not. I said I thought the gentleman was sincere and honest about it, but I pointed out the fact that the gentleman was supporting the position of an interest that has contributed to other gentlemen's campaign funds. [Applause.] I do not mean that to reflect on the gentleman, not for a minute, because I do not think they ever contributed to the gentleman's campaign fund.

More than that, if I wanted to be unkind and to wander back into the record of the gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. HOBSON. Go ahead and do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman to-day is standing with his party on the tariff question, but I could ask him to examine his own record on the 9th day of April, 1909, when the Payne tariff bill was before this House, and Mr. Tawney, of Minnesota, a Progressive Republican so far as the tariff was concerned, was seeking to lower the tax on lumber, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] voted with the standpat Republicans, with Mr. Dalzell and Mr. PAYNE against Mr. Tawney and against the gentleman's own party. I could also point to him that on the same day a motion was made by Judge De Armond, of Missouri, to put lumber on the free list in accordance with the then existing platform of the Democratic Party, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] voted with Mr. Dalzell and Mr. PAYNE to sustain the Payne rates on lumber and against the Democratic Party and its position to put lumber on the free list. [Applause.] The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] preferred to tax the shelter of the poor, rather than to stand in line with his Democratic colleagues on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I know that the galleries of the House at that time were filled with a lobby in the interest of the Lumber Trust, that it was a stench in the nostrils of the people of this country the way the lumber interest was performing and the way it did succeed in maintaining the Payne rates on lumber, which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] voted for. [Applause.] But I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that, although I do not think it was to his credit to abandon his party or the true interests of his people in casting that vote, I believe myself that the gentleman voted from motives that he believed to be right. I do not stand here to challenge the motives of the gentleman from Alabama even if he does desire to challenge mine. [Applause.] I merely say that when the gentleman charges that there is a mote in my eye, that he had better examine his own eye. [Applause.] So far as the interests of the people of Alabama and to vote to uplift the lowly and to stand against the strong and powerful, I am only too glad to put my votes in comparison with those of the gentleman from Alabama. [Applause.] At the time the gentleman cast that vote on lumber there were great lumber interests in his district, and at that same time they were reducing the tax on pig iron and other iron commodities in my district. Some of my constituents were protesting, but I cast my vote in the interest of the masses of the people of this country. [Applause.]

When it came down to writing a tariff bill I did not shirk when the knife came to me. The gentleman charges me with being a tool of the interests, the representative of Wall Street, a follower of the liquor interests, and yet when it became necessary to pass a bill that would relieve the American people of unjust taxation, I allowed every single thing in my district to go on the free list, because I knew and knew well that the man who led that fight must bare his own breast to the storm before he could carry his followers over the breastworks. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret that this controversy should have been brought on the floor of the House of Representatives, but in conclusion I want to say that I challenge any man to show that I have been the tool of any interests in this country. I challenge any man to inspect my record for 18 years and show a single vote that has not been in the interest of the masses of my constituency and against the great trusts of this country. [Applause.]

I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that, so far as I am personally concerned, no matter how much mud he may sling at me during the coming campaign, I do not intend to be involved in any such controversy. [Applause.] I welcome his criticism of my record in a legitimate way. I shall endeavor to criticize his record in a gentlemanly and legitimate way. But no matter what he may say or what he may do, I can assure him that he can not provoke me into wading in the mire of dirty politics in Alabama. [Great applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, before I say anything on the question I would like to have 3 or 4 minutes in addition to my 10, for fear I may not finish in 10 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Make it five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that his time may be increased five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, with just a quotation from the New York World, I shall confine what I have to say to matters that took place or that have failed to take place in this body. What brought about this on my part was the fact that we had been here day after day with a very small attendance. This great money bill came along, which, in my opinion, was a greater measure than the tariff measure.

The conference report came in about the same time. As everyone knows, that money bill took two or three weeks to settle, and all these men that had taken in caucus a prominent part in the conference report took a very passive part in the passing of the money bill. I said one day, "What has become of all these great men?" Some one called attention to the fact that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] who addressed us was hardly ever here. It occurred to me that that was true. To me it appeared strange, Mr. Speaker, that a man gifted as he is, so capable of illustrating his ideas, should absent himself, knowing as I did the rules that we all have to agree to when the Member says to the occupant of the Speaker's rostrum, "I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter" [reading from oath administered to Members of the House upon taking their seats].

Did some enemy of that great gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] put that oath in the books in order to get him in trouble at some later day? [Laughter.] Just the other day on the floor of this House I heard our great Speaker say that it did not meet the question to have the pot call the kettle black, but it seems to be ethical with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] that in getting out of a hole he shall pull somebody else into it. That would be a fine way to repair a wagon on the highway. If you have one wagon in a mud hole, pull another one in it.

Mr. Speaker, there is no one present in this body as a Member of it, or in any other legislative body of which I have been a member, who would say that I hesitate to speak the truth. It would make no difference to me whether the man of whom I spoke is a member of my party or of some other party. I always try to speak the truth. I have no stock in trade but the truth, and if I have made a statement about the gentleman that is not true I am sorry. I made it honestly, and I made it, as I say—

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, I refuse to be interrupted. My time is limited. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if I had had any idea that this was to be turned to an artful purpose, used to parade the gentleman's hold upon the public, or used to take advantage of the public, then I apologize to the other Members of the body for having been the cause of such a thing.

Mr. Speaker, I will supplement my statement of absenteeism more fully and clearly. I take the gentleman as he appears from the amateur stage, when he graduated, and I leave out his first term. Let us take now the Sixty-first Congress. In the first session of the Sixty-first Congress there were 61 roll calls—61 yea-and-nay votes. This most delightful character was absent 12 times, voting 26. He voted once to make a quorum and once on the question of a quorum he failed to vote. Let me repeat that. The gentleman was absent 12 times in the session of the Sixty-first Congress. He voted with our friends upon the other side, the Republicans, 6 times as against 12. He voted once to make a quorum and on the question of a quorum once he failed to vote. Twenty-six times he voted.

In the second session of the Sixty-first Congress the books show that he was absent 58 times, and according to the books in that second session of the Sixty-first Congress he voted 60 times—2 times more than he was absent. In that same second session of the Sixty-first Congress he voted with the stand-pat Republicans, which was a delightful pleasure, as the books will show, 7 times, and in that Congress he voted 10 times to make a quorum, and that was the extent of his vote. He voted "present" 6 times, and he failed to vote on the question of making a quorum 11 times. In the third session of the Sixty-first Congress he did not vote 43 times. He voted 59 times. He did a little better that time. He voted with the Republicans—that great Democrat, HOBSON from Alabama—8 times in that session, and he voted 22 times to make up a quorum, and 10 times he failed to vote in the making of a quorum, and 1 time he is recorded as being present.

Now let us take the Sixty-second Congress. This is where he performed his duty in a most faithful way. In that Congress there were three sessions. In the first session he did not vote or was absent 51 times. He voted 12 times—a beautiful memory! Perhaps I am committing a crime in calling attention to this, but during the time that Mr. Speaker Crisp occupied the chair now occupied by our distinguished Speaker the following statute was passed:

The Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

The only excuse that the distinguished gentleman makes is that he has been paired sometimes; that is, it takes two Members to make a pair, and it means that there are two absent, so that a man might pair himself with another at the beginning of the session, and neither one need ever come around and yet get the whole salary. [Laughter.] Let me finish the first session of the Sixty-second Congress. He did not vote 51 times. He failed to vote to make a quorum 14 times and voted "present" 3 times—a beautiful citizen; a beautiful Member of Congress! In the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, again, he did not vote 134 times. I wonder if there was some vicious liquor dealer who kept him away from doing his duty. [Laughter.] He voted 58 times. He voted with the Republicans 6 times, and this is the man they are going to send to represent Alabama in the upper House! He voted "present" 11 times and voted to make a quorum 15 times and failed to vote to make a quorum 30 times. He did a little better in the last session of the Sixty-second Congress. He did not vote 49 times; he voted 64 times; voted with the stand-pat Republicans 6 times, voted "present" 6, voted to make a quorum 26, and failed to vote to make a quorum 17 times.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had present here these pages, every one of them, for everyone to see. We have had here the attachés of this building, every one of them present. Now, what are we going to say of men with this great salary and honor and prestige? Let the ship run as it may? Suppose some more stayed away. I want to call attention to the conditions and the type of men who come to us from Alabama. We all know on the roll call the first name we hear is that of an Alabamian, and I challenge anyone if he remembers the time when he failed to vote, and that is ABERCROMBIE. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If there is one State in this Union whose Members are consistently present it is that State—Alabama—with one exception. The President from that rostrum a few months ago told us to do our duty. He appeared upon that rostrum but lately with the same appeal for us to do our duty. I have evidence here that one gentleman from Alabama mentioned here has always done his duty. I will read this letter, for it ought to go into the RECORD as an example to new Members, as an example to everyone to do his duty. It is a tribute to good work; it is a tribute to honorable men who give the best that is in them to their country, without fear or hope of reward. This is it. It is a gem, in my estimation, and it is a proud heritage to the gentleman to whom it is addressed and his family:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 10, 1913.

HON. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CLAYTON: I am a great deal concerned at the thought of losing you from the working force of the House of Representatives. As the chief direction of affairs in the present session has lain with the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Banking and Currency, I foresee that the chief responsibilities of the next session will lie with the Committee on the Judiciary, of which you are chairman. I was looking forward with great satisfaction to working with you and having your experienced counsel and assistance in the work that is before us. It seems to me, indeed, indispensable in the carrying out of our party's program.

I do not deem myself at liberty to suggest to you anything that would interfere with your own personal plans, and I feel rather selfish in saying what I am saying, but I considered it a matter of mere public duty on my part to say how earnestly I had desired that I might have your aid and counsel as chairman of the Judiciary Committee during the next session and the next Congress, for our work can not be finished in a single session. If I accomplish no more by this than giving myself the pleasure of letting you know my personal estimate of you, I shall, at any rate, have discharged my conscience in the matter and said what was really in my mind and heart. If I dared, I would beg you to remain in the House.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Then the answer to the President from the courtly chairman of the Judiciary Committee is a missive that any State could well be proud to have come from the pen of any of her honored sons. It shows loyalty to party that is akin to religious faith:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Your letter of October 10 was duly delivered by special messenger. Of course it gave me great pleasure to know your kind opinion of my past services and the possibilities of usefulness you consider me capable of in the succeeding sessions of Congress. My work heretofore in its connection with you has been exceedingly pleasant. I have been in hearty sympathy with all your patriotic plans and purposes, in so far as I have known them.

I have consulted with such friends as I could reach, and they have agreed with me that I should look upon the wish expressed by you, as the head of the party, as imperative. I will therefore give notice of my intention to remain in the House during the present Congress and retire from the race for the Senate from Alabama and submit the matter of my reelection as Representative to the loyal Democrats of the third congressional district of Alabama.

I want to say to you formally what I said to you in person in our conversation at the White House last night—that I am very deeply appreciative of and grateful for the great compliment you have paid me in your letter.

Sincerely, yours,

HENRY D. CLAYTON.

Now, gentlemen, notice the date of the President's letter mentioned of the 10th of October. That was published in the Washington Post Sunday, the 12th. Where did that letter find that great man, HENRY D. CLAYTON? Right here attending to his duty. A letter by special messenger reached him. Where was the so-called, in his own estimation, great man from Alabama? [Laughter.] He could not be found, according to the Sergeant at Arms, although I ought to apologize; he may be here by warrant of the Sergeant at Arms for all I know. [Laughter.] The Sergeant at Arms most diligently tried to find him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed indefinitely and conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may be allowed to proceed—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not know that I need any more, but I will take one minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. Make it five.

Mr. DONOVAN. Five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I should say that I want the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] to tell some truths when he returns home, and this is the truth I want him to tell. Probably I have as much sympathy for that section of the country as anyone.

There lies in an unmarked grave an uncle of mine who fought on the Confederate side.

I realize that there have been years in the South United States officials who are just so much barter and trade and handfuls of clay, and used for vicious purposes. You go back home and say that when the amendment to the urgent deficiency bill to regulate the appointment of deputy United States marshals and deputy revenue collectors to protect the people of the South came up for action you were absent, but that the "gentleman from Connecticut," with two associates, gave the bill its majority to free the South from that obnoxious crew that has controlled the offices in the past. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You go back to the South and say that from old New England there were only four votes for that bill, one cast by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILMORE] and three cast by Representatives from Connecticut. You tell your people that you deserted your interests and that the South had to depend on the gentleman from Connecticut, with his associates, to bring the bill to a conclusion and right the wrong that had been existing in Dixie. Tell that to your people and keep some of your talk out of your book of imagination, which seems to be your stock in trade.

You want to say this, too—and I am going to emphasize it—that when that great measure known as the Payne-Aldrich bill came in here—and why the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did not tell it all I do not know—four times you [Mr. HOBSON] voted for the Payne-Aldrich crew. The bill was in this House three different times. You voted on its final passage the first time. Where were you when it came back from the Senate on the 9th of July, 1909? You were absent. You were here on the 12th, for you voted on the income tax. You were here on the 20th, for you voted with us Democrats on the urgent deficiency bill; but, gentlemen, that is when it came back from the Senate. On the final passage of the bill, July 31, there were three yea-and-nay votes, and on the first roll call there were 11 absent, and on the third and final 10 absent, and the distinguished gentlemen [Mr. HOBSON] was one of those. Out of that 11 there were 4 pairs, 3 without a pair, and the distinguished gentleman [Mr. HOBSON] was one of the three. On the last bill there were four pairs, and two without a pair, and the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] was one of the two. The gentleman states that he had a pair for the session. The books do not show it. I do not know how he fixes it. Once he was paired with Mr. FOWLER and at another time with Mr. CAPRON. This time it does not show that he had a pair at all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman, or others who care to talk on this subject, may be further extended.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I only want to read this one thing, from the New York World, and that is a Democratic newspaper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to read an article from the New York World. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOVAN. The article is as follows:

HOBSON AGAIN!

Fifteen years ago last June RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON was a hero. He has been a nuisance ever since. With his militarism, his jingoism, his anti-Japanism, he has been a visitation upon his afflicted country.

Now he is running for the United States Senate against OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD. He feels that demands for $50,000,000 for the Navy for 10 superdreadnoughts, even for immediate war with Japan, have lost their pristine charm. So he turns over a new leaf by denouncing Mr. UNDERWOOD as "the tool of the whisky ring and the money interests."

Coming on the heels of the passage of the Underwood Tariff Act, it is hard to decide whether this charge is the more outrageous or ludicrous. With South Carolina threatening to send Cole Blaise to the United States Senate, the bare possibility that Alabama might inflict Hobson on the country is enough to arouse a nation-wide interest in Mr. UNDERWOOD's candidacy.

[Laughter.]

FRANCHISES IN PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 209).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, the message to be printed and the accompanying documents to be filed with the committee:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 32 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the Executive Council of Porto Rico, which are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me. Such of these as relate to railroad, street railway, telegraph, and telephone franchises, privileges, or concessions have been approved by me, as required by the joint resolution of May 1, 1900 (31 Stat., 715).

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 7, 1913.

Mr. MANN. What was the document that accompanied the President's message? I did not catch it. What was the document ordered to be printed?

The SPEAKER. The message was ordered to be printed, but the accompanying documents, certified copies of franchises, and so forth, are sent to the committee.

LAWS OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS (S. DOC. NO. 205).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, the message to be printed and the accompanying documents to be filed with the committee:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 86 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith a set of the laws enacted by the Third Philippine Legislature, during its first session, from October 16, 1912, to February 3, 1913, inclusive, and its special session from February 6, 1913, to February 11, 1913, inclusive, and also certain laws enacted by the Philippine Commission.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 7, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The accompanying documents are copies of the statutes, and they are not ordered to be printed. If the House wants them printed hereafter, it can be done.

LAWS OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 206).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, the message to be printed and the accompanying documents to be filed with the committee:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 31 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico during the extraordinary session beginning June 20 and ending August 19, 1913.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 7, 1913.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEDMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for 10 days, on account of death in his family.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold his motion for a moment, I wish to ask that the House indulge me in a personal statement. I do not suppose it will take more than three minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will withhold the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday, in the consideration of an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill providing for an extra month's pay for the employees of the House, I addressed the House for five minutes. I was followed later by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], and I wish now to direct attention to what he stated in reference to my remarks. Mr. Sisson said:

Somebody stated a moment ago that it would be cowardly and pusillanimous for a man to take the position that I now take; that he ought not to have a right to represent the people on the floor of this House.

Farther along Mr. Sisson made this further statement:

When you say that a man is cowardly because he endeavors to protect the Public Treasury, when you say that a man is cowardly because he is not willing to stand by that which he believes to be right—when you make a statement of that kind you make it evidently without well considering what you are doing, and you have a contempt for every man who does not vote for what you wish. I believe the gentleman says that he never voted for a bill to tax the people and never voted against an appropriation bill except because it was too small.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement as that construed by the gentleman from Mississippi. I have too much respect for myself, and I certainly have too much respect and consideration for my colleagues, to make such an unwise and unjust statement as that. I can very well excuse the gentleman from Mississippi, because in a running debate here it is almost impossible at times to accurately understand statements made by the Members. But evidence of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi misunderstood what I did say can be easily obtained by a reading of what I actually said, and it is printed in Saturday's RECORD without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

I know the gentleman from Mississippi would not intentionally do me an injury or misrepresent me. But the man who has a double rôle to perform in this House, like the gentleman from Mississippi, has some excuse for misunderstanding what a Member may state in the heat of a running debate, for we all know that the mantle of the great Daniel Webster has fittingly fallen on the shoulders of the gentleman from Mississippi as the expounder and defender of the Constitution; and he not only fills that position with credit to himself, but to the entire satisfaction of this House; and since the passing of Judge Holman, of Indiana, the gentleman fills his position as a Member of this House in being the never-resting, vigilant, watchful guardian of the public funds in the Treasury of the United States. A man with these two great occupations in the American Congress is to be excused if he misunderstands what a colleague may state here in a running debate. It is true that I never vote against appropriations, and I made a campaign in my district in which I stated—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order, and ask for order. I think the two gentlemen from Alabama who have been quarreling for two hours here ought not to make up on the floor of the House at the expense of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I did make a campaign in my district on the proposition that I would never vote against—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. Sisson. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. AUSTIN. Three minutes.

Mr. Sisson. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. I did make a campaign in Tennessee on a platform to never vote for a tax and never vote against an appropriation, and I have carried out that pledge in good faith, and as a result my majority was increased from 800 to 4,000. [Laughter and applause.] But I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and in the House I did vote to report one of his bills which was embraced in the last public buildings bill providing $50,000 for a public building at Water Valley, Miss., where the Government pays $440 a year rent for a post office, where the population is less than 5,000, and where the total postal receipts are under $10,000.

But, Mr. Speaker, in view of the invaluable services rendered by the gentleman from Mississippi in the two capacities I have named I felt justified, not only in voting for a handsome public building in his own district, but I am sure I would be justified in the eyes of the American people in voting for a public building at every town, village, and hamlet in the State of Mississippi. I go further, Mr. Speaker. When I consider the length, breadth, and value of the gentleman's services as "the watchdog of the Treasury" and the defender of our Constitution, I would be tempted, in fact, to vote to send the standing Army to drive out every boll weevil in Mississippi. And in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I would be justified in voting for a levee system as high as the Washington Monument, if necessary, to preserve the sacred soil of Mississippi from the overflows of the great Mississippi River. I would not stop at that, Mr. Speaker. I would search out the men who gave to the Nation such a fitting successor of Daniel Webster and Judge Holman, and I would let every man who voted to send him to this House have the right to draw on the Treasury of the United States at his own sweet will and pleasure whenever he was out of funds, and I would vote to pension him and all of his relatives, as well as all of his descendants. Now, having made this frank and open statement, I throw myself upon the generosity of this House, and I pray to be restored quickly and fully to the hearts and affections of my honored and loved colleagues, including the gentleman from Mississippi. [Laughter.]

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of a minute or so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] and I have always been good friends, and I am glad that he does not take seriously any statement which tended in any way, if it did so, to put him in a false light, because I did not intend to do that. On the contrary, it was during the heat of a debate, and I had heard my friend say so frequently in private conversations that he always made campaigns down in his district upon the idea that he never voted for a bill to tax the people, and never voted against an appropriation bill except because it was too small. So I was simply a little nettled because, as I thought, the gentleman from Tennessee was endeavoring to put some of us in the attitude of being very cowardly because we saw fit and proper sometimes to oppose some appropriations. But the gentleman evidently did not state exactly what I understood, because he says the RECORD states exactly what he said, and he did not say exactly what I quoted him as saying. Therefore I am willing to have the RECORD show that the gentleman made the other statement, and not the statement which I attributed to him.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission briefly to correct an error in a statement which I made here during the debate on Saturday last on the urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. COOPER. Three or four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, during the debate on the bill containing the paragraph relating to the memorial bridge, I said that I did not own and never had owned any interest in real estate except in the State of Wisconsin. That was absolutely true as to my not owning any real estate on Saturday elsewhere than in Wisconsin.

But 20 or more years ago, through the death of a relative, I inherited an undivided one-fifth interest in about 30 acres in the State of Washington on the Pacific coast. I never have been in the State of Washington nor ever seen the land. Years ago I quitclaimed all my interest in it to the owners of the other undivided shares.

More recently another relative died, and I became the owner of an undivided one-quarter interest in two or three lots of land in the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington. This interest I also quitclaimed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will not the gentleman come out to Tacoma and see some good real estate?

Mr. ADAMSON. What—on the way out? [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. These transactions did not occur to me, probably because I never have seen any of the lands, and also because there was no money or other property consideration involved. Although this is of no great importance, yet I thought best to mention it, because it always is well to correct even minor inaccuracies appearing in the Record in statements which purport to present facts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the balance of this session be devoted to such remarks as Members desire to make, and that the rest of us be permitted to go home.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is out of order.

Mr. MANN. That would not leave anybody here except on that side of the House.

[Mr. BRUMBAUGH addressed the House. See Appendix.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 41, answered "present" 8, not voting 271, as follows:

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, which I had forgotten. I answered "yea," and I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "present."

The name of Mr. MORRISON was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with Mr. ASWELL, of Louisiana. I wish to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. McLAUGHLIN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. HAYDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 14, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4433) granting an increase of pension to John Reilly; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7058) granting a pension to Charles A. Van Atta; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GREGG: A bill (H. R. 8846) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 8847) amending paragraph 81 of the act creating a public utilities commission; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 8848) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 8849) to enlarge, extend, remodel, and improve the post-office building at Albert Lea, Minn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CARLIN: A resolution (H. Res. 285) referring the bill (H. R. 8850) for the relief of the heirs of David H. Creel to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARLIN: A bill (H. R. 8850) for the relief of the heirs of David H. Creel; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CASEY: A bill (H. R. 8851) to place the name of Jedediah C. Paine upon the unlimited retired list of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 8852) granting a pension to Isaac Cary; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8853) granting an increase of pension to Franklin T. Alderman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 8854) granting an increase of pension to Anne Darcy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 8855) granting a pension to Martha A. Kaiser; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 8856) granting an increase of pension to James Carroll; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARLIN: Papers to accompany bill (H. R. 8850) for the relief of the heirs of David H. Creel; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Petition of the Third Annual State Conference on Taxation, Binghamton, N. Y., requesting Congress to provide for collecting statistics of wealth, debt, and taxation, as authorized by permanent census act, at the earliest practicable moment; to the Committee on the Census.

Also, petition of the District Lodge, No. 44, International Association of Machinists, Washington, D. C., favoring an immediate change in the naval regulations so as to permit representation of the employees on the wage boards; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: Papers to accompany bill (H. R. 6841) for the relief of William Lammerhirt; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany bill (H. R. 1202) for the relief of Julius Widdigen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MCGILLICUDDY: Petition of Camden (Me.) Board of Trade, favoring passage of legislation for protection from floods of the territory adjacent to the lower Mississippi River; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Petition of citizens of the thirty-seventh congressional district of New York, favoring the passage of legislation compelling concerns selling goods direct to the consumer, by mail, to contribute their portion of the funds for the development of the local community, county, and State; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 14, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, impress us with the fact that it is Thou who hast made us and endowed us with wonderful faculties of mind and soul and dignified us with the power of choice, which reflects Thy glory in us; that we are here to subdue every evil intent and rise to the dignity of self-control, and thus become conquerors of the now and be fitted for the then by the development of the divine within, that we may present ourselves before Thee with a character after the similitude of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the deficiency bill has been signed or not?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it on the Speaker's desk?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen or heard of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Here it is now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum present—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the point. The Speaker has already declared there is no quorum present, and it is too late to withdraw that declaration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether there is a quorum in town, but to demonstrate the fact I will move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is not that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the motion is debatable.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the Chair has any authority for saying it is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether it is debatable or not. He has never heard the question raised, never heard anybody attempt to debate it, and has always taken for granted that it is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. I have not been able to find any authority that it is not.

Mr. HARDWICK. On principle it is not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold, as a matter of ordinary common sense, that it is not debatable. It is one of those motions that is intended to expedite business like a motion for the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair, although I think it will be well for him to have the parliamentary clerk look it up.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair will hunt it up before it is raised the next time, but the Chair is reasonably certain, unless it has been decided half a dozen times the other way, that it is not debatable.

Mr. HARDWICK. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois the Speaker's ruling is correct, because when it develops a quorum is not present no business can be transacted except to adjourn or a call of the House to bring in absentees.

The SPEAKER. It is on all fours with a motion to table, with a motion for the previous question, and those other motions that are intended to expedite business. It is a kind of summary process.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, the motions that occur in connection with bringing in a quorum are debatable unless—

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will permit, suppose the previous question was demanded, then you would have an intervening roll call on something else with a quorum not present.

Mr. MANN. That might be; but there are a great many motions that can be made during a call of the House, some of which are debatable.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; nothing except such propositions as relate to the calling of a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but that is what this is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled. Those in favor of the call of the House will answer "aye" and those opposed "no." [After a pause.] The ayes have it. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). One hundred and fifty-four gentlemen have responded "Present."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that there is not a quorum in town to-day. I shall attempt to get one to-morrow by sending out for the absentees. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I will withhold it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry and submit a personal request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire—I have my own views about it—whether it is in the power of the House now to grant me leave of absence for to-morrow and the other sessions for a week?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the House, when without a quorum, can only adjourn or take steps necessary to secure a quorum. The Chair is of opinion that the House can revoke leave of absence, and therefore the Chair is of opinion that those present could grant leave of absence.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it has been frequently ruled—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is a temporary one, and he was just giving his opinion.

Mr. MANN. It has been ruled consistently that the House could not give a leave of absence without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that this is obiter, so far as anything before the House is now concerned, and is not binding on the Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have been here for six months continuously, and I am advised by my physician that I ought not to remain here and am instructed not to remain here. I make this statement to let those present take notice of the fact and give me leave of absence. Whatever the effect of my request may be, whether it is granted now or hereafter, I am advised that I should go. I have been here continually in season and out of season in attendance on the sessions of the House. I am compelled to leave, not on account of business, but on account of my physical condition. I ask to be excused from to-morrow's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] make any formal request?

Mr. BARTLETT. I request, Mr. Speaker, that I be excused from attendance on to-morrow's session and the other sessions this week.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to make a point of order that that request could not be granted by the House in the absence of a quorum. To-morrow, without question, the leave of absence will be granted to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Illinois understands I am not asking this for reason of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair may be indulged for a moment, he would state to the House that other Members have come in and the Chair would suggest that they be allowed to be recorded as present.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am advised now, Mr. Speaker, that my request can not be put, and I therefore withdraw it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will see to it to-morrow that the gentleman gets his leave.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent now that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] be excused on account of ill health. That is the fact of the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there have been many rulings to the effect that the House, when without a quorum, could not grant a leave of absence. The House can excuse the gentleman without having the matter brought before the House to-day. To-morrow there will be difficulty about that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] withdraws his request, and therefore there is no occasion for the Chair to rule on the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The Clerk will call the names of those gentlemen who are in the Hall and who have failed to answer to the roll call.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have my name called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is making the motion to adjourn, what he thinks can be accomplished by adjourning at this time? Would we be any nearer to a quorum to-morrow than we are now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope so. I expect to ask the whips to telegraph Members to return to the city to make a quorum and to make a statement in the papers as to the necessity of having the quorum here. I am satisfied that there is not a quorum in town to-day. That is the reason why I do not hold the House here now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sisson. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps this is not the way to get a quorum, because Members leaving town will not come back merely by having a straw thrown at them. Sometimes they do not come back when we throw clods at them. You sometimes have to adopt the old blue-backed spelling-book story and get some rocks to throw.

If the House remains in session, and a call of the House is ordered, and notice goes out to the country that Members are absent and not here attending to their business, it will intensify the necessity of Members remaining here. Those of us who have been here all the time, those of us who have been here continuously, are being punished by Members who are absent. I know that there are numbers of gentlemen who are here who are just as anxious to get home as those men who have gone home. I have my own business affairs that I have been neglecting, and I should like to get home for business reasons.

Mr. MANN. Why do you not adjourn?

Mr. Sisson. As far as I am concerned, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that as soon as we get this bill out of the way I shall vote to adjourn the House and permit the Senate to work on currency, so that the House can be reconvened as soon as the Senate is ready with currency. I will support such a resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a privileged resolution. Why do you not offer it?

Mr. Sisson. We have not passed this bill yet.

Mr. MANN. A resolution fixing the date.

Mr. Sisson. We have not passed this bill yet. I am willing to offer such a resolution at the proper time.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am willing that it should be passed.

Mr. Sisson. I am willing to offer a resolution that the House adjourn subject to the call of the Speaker, if a resolution of that kind is in order.

Mr. PAYNE. That would not be in order, but the other resolution would.

Mr. Sisson. If the Senate want to remain and look after the currency bill—

Mr. MANN. They do not "want" to remain.

Mr. Sisson. They can do so. It is up to them. The Constitution provides for this specific situation, so that the body that has nothing to do may, with the consent of the other body, adjourn so that the Members may go home and attend to their affairs. For that reason I do not think the House ought to adjourn at this time to-day, but I believe we ought to stay here and exhaust all the remedies we have to-day to try to bring the absent Members here who are in the city, and let the order go out to the country again to bring back absent Members, and let the papers carry it to the country again that they were compelled to be brought back and stating that an order has been issued for the arrest of absent Members, to bring them back, because it seems to me the membership of the House who have remained here should be getting tired of absenteeism.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Sisson. I will.

Mr. MANN. Would not the courteous thing to do be first to have the House telegraph the absent Members to return?

Mr. Sisson. I have no objection to that course being taken to-day, but to-morrow, it seems to me, that we ought not to permit the House to adjourn again without taking all the necessary steps to get the Members back and get this bill out of the way. As I understand, it is the only thing on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there are a number of bills on the calendar.

Mr. Sisson. I mean this is the only business necessary to be attended to now.

Mr. MANN. Then why not adjourn, if that is the case?

Mr. Sisson. I am willing to adjourn as soon as we get this deficiency bill out of the way, for this is all the House ought to do until the Senate sends the currency bill back to us.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be willing to, but—

Mr. Sisson. There is no "but" with me; absolutely none.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman from Alabama offer a motion that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to telegraph absent Members to return, without taking any further action to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I intended to have the whips notify the absentees, but I will adopt the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois. I move that the Sergeant at Arms, in his official capacity, be directed to immediately telegraph and notify every absentee who has not appeared on the roll call to-day to return at once on account of important business that the House must transact.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I should like to suggest that the absentees be notified in that telegram that no further salaries will be paid until they do return.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would take an enactment of law.

Mr. MANN. We can not do that.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama before he puts that motion whether the other gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] is present to-day? [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to telegraph all Members of the House who have not responded to the roll call to-day, notifying them that their presence is necessary for the transaction of the public business.

Mr. BARNHART. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama to include in that request that all of the Members of Congress be notified and not a part of them, as was done in the last notification.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, which covers all absentees from the House. All those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama will say "aye."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not a request for unanimous consent; it is a motion.

Mr. RAKER. Well, let us not be in a hurry. I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the House was dividing on the proposition.

Mr. RAKER. I was on my feet trying to get recognition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that as the House was dividing the gentleman is too late to interrupt.

The question was taken, and the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 15, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 8857) for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. FRANCIS: A bill (H. R. 8858) to prohibit the pollution of navigable waters or their tributaries, and in the interest of the public health; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 8884) to take fourth-class post-office appointments from under civil-service rules and regulations; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. FAISON: Resolution (H. Res. 286) to investigate the manufacture and sale of commercial fertilizers; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DIXON: A bill (H. R. 8859) granting a pension to Laura A. Cumbach; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8861) granting a pension to Elizabeth Broadhead; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8862) granting an increase of pension to Amelia Raschig; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8863) granting an increase of pension to Leroy M. Manis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8864) granting an increase of pension to Norval G. Sparks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8865) granting an increase of pension to William Seal; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8866) granting an increase of pension to James A. Simmons; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8867) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca J. Forry; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8868) granting an increase of pension to John Baer, jr.; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8869) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Lawless; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8870) granting an increase of pension to Martha A. Riker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8871) granting an increase of pension to Orpha Corya; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8872) granting an increase of pension to Ephraim A. McWilliams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8873) granting an increase of pension to Emeline Collins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8874) granting an increase of pension to Edwin I. Bachman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8875) granting an increase of pension to Frank Robinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8876) granting an increase of pension to Charles C. Taylor; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8877) for the relief of the estate of John M. Abbott, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DRISCOLL: A bill (H. R. 8878) granting an increase of pension to Thomas O'Brien; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8879) granting a pension to Frank Gravins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8880) granting a pension to Mary B. Galloway; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 8881) granting a pension to Hershel C. Ferrell; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8882) granting an increase of pension to Luman G. Heusted; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8883) granting an increase of pension to Lyndon Y. Jenness; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. PROUTY: Petition of citizens of Roland, Colo., Dexter, De Soto, Earlham, Marksburg, Valley Junction, Van Meter, Gilbert, and Story City, all in the State of Iowa, favoring the passage of legislation compelling concerns selling goods direct to the consumer by mail to contribute their portion of the funds for the development of the local community, county, and State; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. J. M. C. SMITH: Petition of H. N. Turrel & Co. and 10 others, of Litchfield; A. G. Butler and 10 others, of Bellevue; C. R. Garrett and 6 others, of Augusta; Jones, Aldrich & Moreaw Co. and 9 others, of Galesburg; F. H. Gage and 9 others, of Olivet; F. E. Demming & Co. and 10 others, of Homer; G. W. Schneider and 17 others, of Albion; James H. Parks and 15 others, of Eaton Rapids; L. W. Robinson Co. and 12 others, of Battle Creek, all in the State of Michigan, in support of H. R. 5308, to equalize transportation rates on merchandise; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Petition of citizens of the twenty-seventh congressional district of New York, favoring the passage of legislation compelling concerns selling goods direct to the consumer by mail to contribute their portion of the funds for the development of the local community, county, and State; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 15, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, as the sun rises morning after morning and fills the earth with light, warmth, and beauty, so may our minds be illumined with new light and our hearts warmed with brotherly love, that we may worship Thee in the beauty of holiness and go forth to the new duties of the new day with joy and gladness, speaking and living the truth as it is given us to see the truth, that the waste places may be made glad and the desert places blossom as the rose and the Christ spirit shall possess every heart. And everlasting praise be Thine, O God, our Father. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Monday, October 13, 1913, and Tuesday, October 14, 1913, were read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7898. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 111. Joint resolution to authorize the reinstatement of Adolph Unger as a cadet in the United States Military Academy; and

H. J. Res. 132. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the Sixth National Corn Exposition, to be held at Dallas, Tex., during the month of February, 1914.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER. The contested-election case in the twelfth district of Missouri is referred to Committee on Elections No. 3. The case in the third district of the State of Michigan is referred to Committee on Elections No. 1. The cases in the first district of Oklahoma and the second district of Oklahoma are referred to Committee on Elections No. 2.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for a moment. With the signing by the Speaker of the general deficiency bill, which has just been laid before the House, the work that the majority side of the House desires to be responsible for between now and the first Monday in December is completed, unless the currency bill comes back in the meantime from the Senate. I wish to say to the Members of the House that there will be no attempt on the part of the majority to legislate further at this session—that is, up until the first Monday in December—unless the currency bill should come back to the House. In the meantime I think it would be entirely proper for those Members who desire to do so upon either side of the House to go home, and in case an agreement to that effect is reached, a reasonable notice will be given by the majority side to both sides of the House before any business is transacted. If it is necessary for us to adjourn for one day at a time in order to carry out this program, we will have to do so; but I hope very much that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be willing to enter into a pact with me to adjourn for three days at a time, with the understanding that no business will be transacted in the House between now and the 1st day of December unless the currency bill comes back and several days' notice is given to Members on both sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that as a request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not make it as a request for unanimous consent, but when the gentleman from Illinois and myself make a pact we live up to it, and I notice that our fellow Members always sustain us. My remarks are directed not to the House particularly, but to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is one way by which the House can avoid doing business and that is by adjourning. It is a very queer proposition which the gentleman from Alabama presents. Congress being in session, the Democratic majority proposes to do nothing. If that is the case, why not adjourn? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says there will be no business unless the currency bill comes back from the Senate, and everyone who is familiar with the methods and course of legislation in Congress knows that there is no more chance of the currency bill passing the Senate before the 1st day of December than there is of the sun not rising to-morrow morning. I am unwilling to be a party to a proposition which endeavors to place Congress in session and yet not in session at the same time. I would much prefer to be a member of the Mexican Parliament and be arrested by a dictator there than to lack the nerve to face a dictator here and say when we have gotten through business that we are ready to go home.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I desire to be candid with the House and with the gentleman. I know that all of the Members of the House would like to have an adjournment. Most of the Members of this House on both sides have worked earnestly for their constituents during the last year. They have gone through a long and trying summer. There is no one who desires more than I do to give them an opportunity to go home, to be with their friends and constituents and families for a few weeks before the beginning of the December session; but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the administration is earnestly in favor of an early passage of the currency bill; that the President of the United States has asked me, representing this side of the House, not to agree to an adjournment until the currency bill can be passed in the Senate or some satisfactory arrangements made.

Now, I think it is the duty of this side of the House—this is a great party measure; it is one that our party stands for and indorsed both in our platform and by our votes in this House—to sustain the President of the United States in his efforts in that direction, and we intend to do so; but there is no legislation that it is necessary for us to attend to now in the House. We can not adjourn until the Senate adjourns, and it is necessary for us to go through the form of staying here. Last spring when we were working on the tariff bill the Senate was practically in recess. Now that our labors have been completed and the Senate is doing this work there is no necessity for our taking up general legislation. We can not expedite the appropriation bills by staying here, because the estimates will not come in until about the 1st of December.

The other legislation can be taken care of during that session. There is no legislation of importance to keep us here now except the passage of the currency bill, and I make this request for a pact on both sides of the House because we have got to support our policy whether we meet every day and adjourn or whether we meet every three days and adjourn. I make the request not as a party proposition but merely for the convenience of the membership on both sides of this House, and I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will see his way to agree with me, because I have candidly announced our policy and candidly announced the policy of the administration. If it is subject to criticism, we are subject to criticism, anyhow, and we are willing to accept what criticism may lie at our doors for the way in which we support this policy. Now, the question involved is not a question of in any way avoiding our responsibility for our action here; it is merely a question of the convenience of the membership of this House for whom I make the request.

Mr. COX. I quite agree with the gentleman from Alabama that at this time we can not take up the question of the supply bills, because the estimates are not yet prepared and will not be, I think, under the statutes, until the 15th of November; but here is the question: We declared in our last platform for several things, particularly and notably a declaration of our policy in regard to the Philippines. I understand the chairman of that committee is anxious to report a measure to the House, and he wanted to report it at our caucus last spring—a measure which the gentleman well knows when it comes on the floor of the House ought to have considerable discussion. There are other measures, the immigration question, and the question of interlocking directorates that our caucus referred to the Judiciary Committee when we were considering the currency bill. There are probably five or six important platform declarations which we declared for that ought to require considerable discussion on the floor of the House. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what objection is there and what objection can there possibly be on our lifting the ban prescribed against that legislation as it was in our last caucus and turning all the committees loose and let them go to work instead of staying around here doing nothing? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say to the gentleman there never has been a ban in this session of Congress on any committee of this House doing its work. The committees of the House have been at perfect liberty to prepare the legislation for the coming session of Congress. The only inhibition that rested on them was to report those bills to the House. Now, I have not been advised by the chairmen of these committees that at the present time they are prepared to report the legislation to the House. They may be, but if they are they have not advised me of that fact. Now there is this problem: The legislation that the gentleman refers to I am as earnestly in favor of considering as he is, and it ought to be considered. This extra session of Congress was called primarily for the purpose of passing the tariff bill. That bill has become a law. The membership of this House have been here for nearly a year. Men are away from their homes and their districts. In my judgment they will do better, more efficient, and more effective work if they are allowed to go back for a month to see their families and their friends and arrange their private business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. There are a large number of us, I want to say to the gentleman, who do not relish very much going back to our districts when there is a roll call every day here and the absence of a quorum disclosed. Now, if the gentleman will yield a minute further, I will say that I do not want to misquote anything that transpired in our caucus last spring, when the policy was practically agreed upon which the majority side should pursue. I think it was agreed, and admonition probably made to the majority side by our splendid Speaker, that the committees get together and hold their hearings; but they were prohibited from putting bills upon the calendar and calling them up. Now, then, there has not been very much motive or incentive to any of the committees before which any important legislation was pending, knowing there was no chance in the world to call it up, and the query with me is, inasmuch as it is perfectly sure and patent to everybody almost that we are not going to be able to adjourn, why not let us go to work?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the inhibition was only against reporting bills. Now, I do not think that the work the gentleman is talking about is prepared by the committee. It will probably take at least a month, or up to the 1st day of December, to have that work ready to report to the House. But if the chairman of any of these committees or the membership of any of these committees desire to do that work that they think it is proper to do now, there is no inhibition whatever against their remaining in Washington and preparing their legislation.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HARDY. I think it right to say that the committees of investigation have not been able to do anything because they have not had any clerks or clerical force; that those committees might have done something, but they could not do anything in such disorganized state.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman said just now the President's request was that the majority side of the House do not adjourn pending the passage of the currency bill in the Senate or securing some satisfactory agreement in that body.

Now, is it the gentleman's idea to urge upon us that we stay in session either until that bill is passed or until some agreement looking to its passage next session and its early consideration in the Senate then is had if it becomes apparent it can not be passed this session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the question involved in the currency bill now is between the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States. We are not involved in that controversy. I think it is our duty to uphold the President's hands in this matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The bill that we passed meets with our approval, because it received the indorsement of our caucus and our votes in this House. The President is endeavoring to secure the passage of our bill. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am not willing to send an adjournment resolution to the United States Senate under these circumstances, but at the same time I do not desire to punish the membership of this House by compelling them to stay in Washington when we have no further business to transact at this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. One further question. What I was trying to get at was this: What was it the gentleman meant by the expression he used as to either the passage of the currency bill in the Senate during the present session or some satisfactory agreement about it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I mean some agreement that can be entered into between the President and those that control the legislation of the Senate that will be satisfactory to both.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman has some hopes, then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the matter can be arranged in some way or another.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. Touching the suggestions of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], I call your attention to the fact that it is just as difficult to get a quorum of the committees as it is a quorum of the House. It is impossible for us to do any work in the committees unless we can have a quorum of the committees, and that is impossible under existing circumstances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Exactly. I want to say this to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that I do not think that, now we have seen this deficiency bill passed, a great tariff bill passed, and have sent to the Senate a currency bill that will be a great relief to the American people, there is a man, woman, or child that is going to criticize a single Member of this House who has been here all this long summer doing his duty, because he wants to go home for 30 days and get a rest. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman knows that I, together with others similarly situated, have remained here for the sole purpose of helping to have a quorum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have realized that all the time it was impossible to do any committee work because it is impossible to keep a quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that no Member of this Congress can be properly criticized for lack of work; that is, those Members who have stayed here and attended to business.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman a question. I know it is rather a delicate question for him to undertake to pass upon, and he can perhaps speak only of current rumors. It is this: Only about 45 days remain until the regular session of Congress begins. Is it likely, if there is any truth in the rumors that come to us about the condition in the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, that there will be any legislation by the Congress prior to that time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I regret I can not answer the gentleman's question—

Mr. MANN. Of course he does not wish to—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because in so doing I would have to invade the jurisdiction of another body.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I stated in my request for permission to make that inquiry that I did not expect the gentleman to answer positively.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I must decline to answer the gentleman's question for that reason.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Assuming that there are only 45 days until the regular session begins in December, would it not relieve gentlemen from embarrassment to adjourn for a time without impeding legislation?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in corroboration of the views expressed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that it is as difficult a matter to have a quorum of a committee present at any meeting that the chairman might call as it is to have a quorum of the House present called pursuant to law. I have endeavored, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to have repeated meetings of the committee during the discussion of the tariff bill and during the discussion of the currency bill and since, and I have found myself confronted nearly every time by the fact that there is not a quorum of the committee present to do business.

Now, I am not going to reflect upon the membership of either side of this House, but I may say that members of the committee—the minority members and the majority members—many of them, or a number of them, have been absent from the city, and I do not believe that to-day or to-morrow, should I call a meeting of the Committee on the Judiciary, there would be a quorum present.

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the membership of the House understood, and I think the country understood, that at this session, an extraordinary session of Congress, we would deal with the tariff and with the currency bill and nothing else, except necessary appropriation bills; that other legislation would be deferred until the regular session of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is correct.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I therefore think that the position assumed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is correct. We are not ready. For instance, Mr. Speaker, in speaking of this matter of interlocking directorates, which was referred to the committee of which I am the chairman, I have been giving such attention to that as I could in connection with other duties, in connection with attendance on the House and answering roll calls and attendance upon caucuses and attendance upon the discussion of the various matters before the House. The committee itself has not been able to consider that matter as a committee, and I have not been able to work it out in such a way that I would be willing to submit to the House a measure that I would advise this body to enact into law.

I may say that I have talked with those in the other branch of Congress, and with those in high authority; that I have been doing as much reading and studying on the interlocking directorates and cognate subjects and on other phases of the trust question as I could in view of other duties that were incumbent upon me. We are not ready to report. The country did not expect us to report upon important measures from the Judiciary Committee. We can not report now; but we will, as early as possible in the next session, take up these matters in the committee for deliberate consideration, when the country expects us to act and report to the House. It is hoped that the committee will then bring in such measures as will meet the judgment of the Democrats of the House and I hope the Republicans as well, and, I believe, the judgment of the country.

Mr. MANN and Mr. THOMAS rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield? Does he yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] both stated that it has been impossible and would be impossible to get a quorum of committees. That seems to be a rather remarkable statement, that at this session of Congress, with such an overwhelming Democratic majority in the House and with a two-thirds majority in each of these committees, they have been unable to get a meeting of the committees for lack of a quorum, with a great deal of important legislation pending in those committees.

When does the Judiciary Committee expect to take action upon trust legislation? If it waits until December to have a meeting, that matter will not come before the House until late next winter, and then we will be told we can not debate it more than an hour or two, or a very few hours at most, because lack of time prevents full consideration. Gentlemen all seem to assume that there is something sacred about a meeting in December. If there is no adjournment of Congress now, there will be no regular session of Congress. The special session will run into the regular session, and the second session will be the last session of this Congress. October and November are just as good months in which to work as is December, with the Christmas holidays interfering. I notice the distinguished Speaker shakes his head as though I were mistaken. It will not be the first time that a session of Congress in October or November has run over into the regular session; and there will be no adjournment of Congress at the end of the special session in order to meet in regular session, because the only possible excuse for such action would be for Members to put mileage in their pockets which they have not earned, and they do not dare to do it.

Now we are here. The gentleman proposes to make me stay here. A very respectable number of the membership of the House are here this morning, and it is easy enough to get a quorum of committees by Congress stating that it proposes to continue and do business. There is trust legislation; there is the Philippine legislation; there is the immigration legislation. The Alaskan railroad bill is all ready to be reported. While the Senate was waiting upon the House for the tariff legislation it passed a great many bills, some of them of great importance, which are now pending in committees of the House without action. They are waiting. If we proceed now to do business we can adjourn next June. If we wait until December to commence to do business, Congress will again be in session next September, and gentlemen will desire to be away before that time. I say to the gentleman that, with the slowness which, possibly of necessity, characterizes a new administration in the House, it will be impossible for the House to get through with its work next winter and adjourn before next September unless it begins now.

Gentlemen on that side of the House desire to go home. Unless I am mistaken, most of them, when they get home and get into the various rows that they will get into concerning appointments of internal-revenue collectors and postmasters, will wish they had a chance to give an excuse for getting away from home and get back to Washington. I think we ought to stay here and do business. The gentleman says that that side of the House proposes not to do so and to sustain the President. The gentleman might better have said that that side of the House do not propose to do business, but propose to stay here and obey the President. But I do not take it that we are school children in the grammar school, compelled to stay in or go out at the behest of the President or of a school-teacher.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I am perfectly willing to take the responsibility, for good or bad, of the procedure that I have outlined. As the floor leader on this side of the House, I think it is my duty to sustain the President of the United States in his attempt to secure the passage of the currency bill at an early date.

Mr. MANN. I do not criticize the gentleman for that attitude. Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my responsibility. I admit that the gentleman from Illinois has a perfect right to criticize that position if he desires to do so.

Mr. MANN. I do not criticize the position of the gentleman from Alabama. He is entitled to take that responsibility, but I am not willing to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the proposition we submit to the gentleman from Illinois now is a question of mere convenience. I am not going to attempt to hold a quorum here any longer. If subsequently it may appear that the membership of this House is required to be here and a quorum to be here before the 1st day of December, I will send out notice two or three days ahead, or in time to allow the Members to return.

Mr. CRISP. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Alabama. Would there be any impropriety in the House passing a concurrent resolution asking the Senate to consent to the House taking an adjournment for 30 days? That would meet the constitutional requirement which provides that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not satisfied that that could be done.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It is not my purpose and has not been my purpose to raise any objection to what the majority of the Members here seem to desire to do, but as long as some of the important bills have been mentioned it is no more than proper to say that, in my judgment, we have other important legislation the passage of which is necessary to protect the lives and liberties of the working people of the country. I believe the Democratic platform declared that they were opposed to government by injunction, which is simply the usurpation of power by some of the judges of the country. In the last session we passed a very meritorious bill, and when it came to a vote in this House I believe it had only about six or eight in opposition to it. That is the bill known as the seamen's bill. We have recently had another sea disaster, which has resulted in great loss of life. We do not know the cause of that disaster, but it might be possible that it was due to inefficient seamen. Such a catastrophe might happen to one of the American vessels.

Much has been said in the newspapers about encouraging the American merchant marine. This seamen's bill has a provision in it that, in my judgment, will tend to encourage and build up the American merchant marine. It also has a provision which equalizes the cost of the operation of the foreign vessels with American vessels, which, in my judgment, would make it a condition that would be bearable for American workmen to go to sea, and a provision which I believe is indeed of great importance.

We hear it often spoken as to the necessity of building up our Navy, our naval defenses, and those who are well informed know that one of the weaknesses of the Navy is the lack of suitable men. If we build up a condition in the merchant marine where it would encourage the young men of the country to go to sea, it would fit them for naval service in time of emergency.

Therefore it seems to me that this important legislation should be passed by this House, and those who have mentioned other important legislation seem to have overlooked this that I have mentioned. I therefore say that if it was decided that the roll call is to go on, to be kept up, and it becomes necessary for Members to stay here, I think we ought to get busy and do something, instead of sitting here, as we have been recently, and doing nothing.

Personally I have been in favor of taking up some of this important legislation and passing on it, but I felt that I have been greatly in the minority about it. I am not going to oppose the request that is made by the gentleman from Alabama, our leader, but since the question has arisen I felt that I desired to state my position in regard to the matters of important legislation that should be considered at an early date in this Congress.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it seems fitting that we ought to get this situation straight. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle and the minority leader seem disposed to complain because we are not legislating as if this were a regular session. Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that those gentlemen have been obstructing legislation quite considerably during this session? Does anybody believe that these gentlemen are so patriotic in their contention that they want to legislate, or are they simply playing for political capital?

Mr. MANN. We do not ask that side of the House to show us patriotism by a long shot.

Mr. POU. The truth of it, as I believe, is that gentlemen think by calling the President of the United States a school-master autocrat, by demanding a roll call now and then to develop the absence of a quorum, they can gain a little cheap political advantage. They will hardly fool the American people into the belief that they are sincere in these professions that they really want to stay here and legislate, and the answer of the people to these sneers that they are constantly casting at the President of the United States will probably in the future be just the answer they got from a West Virginia congressional district yesterday. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the gentleman from North Carolina. It has not been often that we have had the privilege of hearing from him in recent months; and probably he will not be here the rest of the session.

Now, I think it is to our advantage on this side of the House—and I am perfectly willing to avow it—to show that while Congress is in session most of the Democrats are at home. When they come to answer to the gentlemen who are against them, "Why were you absent so many times on roll calls?" it will be very poor solace to only be able to reply that the gentleman from Alabama excused them. Members of Congress are elected by their constituents; they are paid a reasonably good salary to stay in Washington and attend to business while Congress is in session. I will do my utmost to show that the Democratic majority, instead of attending to business, is at home individually attending to private affairs.

Mr. POU rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. POU. Does the gentleman deny that there is just as large a percentage of Republicans absent on that side of the Chamber as there are Democrats on the Democratic side?

Mr. MANN. But we are not responsible for legislation.

Mr. POU. You are responsible for legislation. What are you in your seats for?

Mr. MANN. I am not responsible for legislation which is enacted, because I am not, like the gentleman from North Carolina, led around by a hook in my nose by a Democratic caucus.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina is never led around by anybody. I will state now that I am perfectly willing to stay here, and I have stayed here. I do not believe I have missed two roll calls. I know I have not missed one important roll call. I am willing to stay here every minute of the time from now until December—yes, until Christmas of next year, if necessary—to put through this great bill which is now pending before the Senate and which the party of the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. MANN] failed to put through during 16 years of uninterrupted power.

Mr. MANN. Yes; a bill which is copied mainly from the Aldrich currency bill, which is a flat denial of the Democratic platform.

Mr. POU. I want also to correct a statement the gentleman made. I misunderstood it at the time, but I am informed that he threw out an intimation that I had been absent for quite a while. As a matter of fact, I have not been absent at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we will test whether the gentleman will be here. I welcome the gentleman being here for the next 45 days. He says he is going to stay here. Let others confess. I hope they will. I will do my utmost to show they are absent if they are not here.

Mr. POU. The point I wanted to make is simply this—and there is no getting away from it—that all of this is a play to the gallery purely for partisan purposes.

Mr. MANN. The play to the gallery is in staying in session when you do not propose to do business, simply because you are ordered to stay.

Mr. BOWDLE rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of patience to the sublimated bunk emanating from the other side, from my distinguished friend, Mr. MANN. I heard him the other day say to this House that he had been absent some two or three weeks and had finally returned here feeling like a fighting cock. I want to say to this House now that I feel like a hen. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman looks it. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, the other night I heard Lew Dockstader sing a song entitled "There is no fun in a graveyard; therefore give me my flowers now." I want to advance somewhat on that theory hereafter in this House, and occasionally I want to rise and pay a genuine tribute to myself.

I have faithfully sat in this House for six months, barring six days. The only time I returned home I was arrested by wire. [Laughter.] I am thoroughly played out, Mr. Speaker. I want to return home to attend to several matters. I have sat here so incessantly and listened to so many things that every morning when I get up and put on my clothes I am admonished sternly that my clothing needs attention. I must return home and give it some attention, for where a man's district is close he ought to make his purchases at home. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I cordially indorse the benevolent and hospitable attitude of our leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want very much to get away at the earliest possible moment, and a little later in the day, if we do not succeed in making an agreement with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, I desire to ask unanimous consent to be absent for two days.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to lay before the House the following requests for leave of absence, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. GOOD requests leave of absence for three weeks, on account of serious illness.

Mr. ALLEN requests leave of absence for 10 days, on account of sickness.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. SHARP requests leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

Mr. PATTEN of New York requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of serious illness.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these requests will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, after to-day I shall have to object to requests of this character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I have received letters from my family in the last two days stating that my son is very sick, under the care of a physician. I ask unanimous consent that I may be excused for the purpose of returning home. I do not know how long I shall be gone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he be excused indefinitely on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a note from a physician to the effect that Mr. BATHRICK is sick and desires a leave of absence for 15 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TISHOMINGO, OKLA., October 15, 1913.

HON. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker, Washington, D. C.

I request to be excused for eight days, to complete important private business while at home.

WM. H. MURRAY, of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLEMP requests leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. J. M. C. SMITH was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Henry R. Miller (H. R. 22572), Sixty-second Congress, second session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIoux CITY, IOWA, October 9, 1913.

HON. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

September 29 I was paired with Mr. KETTNER and my request to be excused for 30 days, account important business. Was objection made to my request? Is my presence demanded?

GEO. C. SCOTT.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman being excused 30 days?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, all these leaves of absence have been revoked.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman is practically asking for 30 days' leave of absence, and that is the reason the Chair laid it before the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. THOMAS. I want to make a few remarks.

The SPEAKER. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. THOMAS. About a couple of minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky that he have two minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I do not happen to live in the State of Ohio, and therefore I do not feel like an old hen. I live in the State of Kentucky, and therefore I feel like a Democratic rooster. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] But that is not what I started to say. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that the Republican Party is not responsible for legislation. It is not, and we all ought to thank God for it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And I believe that the people of this country will see that the Republican Party will not be responsible for any legislation for many, many years yet to come. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That on the adjournment of the House to-day, October 15, 1913, it meet again at 12 o'clock noon, Monday, November 17, 1913.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not in order, because, as I understood, it was not with the concurrence of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a personal request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withhold for the gentleman to make a personal request.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be excused until the 1st of December. I have been from home since the middle of last November.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may be excused until the 1st of December. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I love the company of the gentleman from California too much.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects and the gentleman from Alabama moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the yeas had it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Having offered a privileged resolution fixing the time for adjournment in the future, am I not entitled to a vote upon it?

The SPEAKER. Why, a motion to adjourn is the supreme motion known to parliamentary bodies.

Mr. AUSTIN. But my motion was pending.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged, but that does not cut out a motion to adjourn. That is the supreme motion.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will my motion be in order to-morrow? Should it not be pending for action then?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, but has not looked into it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has the Speaker signed the deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has signed it and submitted it to the House, and it is on the way to the White House. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 43, voting "present" 12, not voting 250, as follows:

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.
The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 4.

A joint resolution requesting Congress to investigate the interpretation and administration of the act to regulate interstate commerce.

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

Whereas by the act of Congress, commonly known as the interstate-commerce act, it is provided, among other things, that all charges made for any service rendered in the transportation of property shall be just and reasonable and every unjust and unreasonable charge is prohibited and declared to be unlawful; and

Whereas it is also further provided in said act that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any person, corporation, or locality in any request whatsoever; and

Whereas said interstate-commerce act also provides that it shall be unlawful for a carrier to charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, when the shorter is included in the longer distance, but contains an unfortunate exception allowing more to be charged for the short than the long haul, if the Interstate Commerce Commission allows it; and

Whereas all these provisions have been and are now being ignored and violated by the carriers, especially those operating in and through the State of North Carolina, thus defying the provisions of the said law, the effect of which is to work great injury to the commercial and industrial interests of the State of North Carolina, to the prejudice and injury of the people of this and other States; and

Whereas shippers and others, citizens of North Carolina, have appealed in vain to the Interstate Commerce Commission for protection against the present intolerable situation, as guaranteed by the provisions of the act aforesaid, and the suppression of the violations of said law on the part of the carriers; that as a result of such fruitless efforts to obtain the relief sought there has been and now is much complaint that the interstate-commerce act is not enforced according to its terms or in the spirit in which it was enacted: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully petitioned by the people of North Carolina to strike out the exception to the application of the long-and-short-haul principle, and further to cause an investigation to be made of the administration of the provisions of the said interstate-commerce act, to ascertain if the said act has been interpreted and enforced as Congress intended, and in accordance with the terms thereof, and if not, the reasons for such nonenforcement; that said investigation make particular inquiry as to violations of the provisions prohibiting unreasonable rates, unjust discriminations, and violations of the long-and-short-haul clause; to ascertain if the coast cities are not the victims of unjust discriminations in freight rates as the result of combinations of railroads and water lines, the effect of which is to suppress competition and deprive coast cities of advantages to which they are entitled and would naturally enjoy by reason of lower water rates were not such combinations permitted to exist; that said investigation also ascertain if the present commerce act is sufficient to meet the conditions and practices complained of, and if not to recommend such amendments as will make the law adequate to prevent the further continuance of unjust and discriminatory practices, unreasonable charges, and the elimination of competition.

Resolved further, That the Members of Congress from the State of North Carolina be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to exercise such influence and take such action as may be proper and necessary to cause said investigation to be made by Congress, that the information herein suggested may be elicited; and that the governor of North Carolina be respectfully requested to use his influence to the same end, by cooperating with the executives of other States and in such other manner as in his judgment seems proper.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the governor to each of the Senators and Members of the House in Congress from the State of North Carolina, and also that copies be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress.

In the general assembly read three times and ratified this the 6th day of October, 1913.

E. L. DAUGHTRIDGE,
President of the Senate.

WALTER MURPHY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Examined and found correct.

FOR COMMITTEE.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Raleigh, October 13, 1913.

I, J. Bryan Grimes, secretary of state of the State of North Carolina, do hereby certify the foregoing and attached (five sheets) to be a true copy from the records of this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done in office at Raleigh this 13th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1913.

[SEAL]

J. BRYAN GRIMES,
Secretary of State.

TRANSPORTATION OF COTTON.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present resolutions adopted by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas, That it is to the interest of all parties concerned in the production, sale, and consumption of cotton grown in the United States, if not an imperative necessity, that a comprehensive and systematic investigation be early set on foot to determine scientifically and satisfactorily what form of package and degree of density of cotton packed or compressed for transportation will best provide economies in the transportation and handling of cotton without injury to its fiber and quality, inquiry to be made with a view to all the differing conditions, localities, and varieties of cotton involved in the decision of this question; be it further

Resolved, That for this purpose the aid of the Federal Government is invoked, through its Department of Agriculture or other proper instrumentalities, in cooperation with the producers' and buyers' organizations, the manufacturers and operators of presses and compresses, transportation agencies and manufacturers of cotton, and others interested in this important matter.

W. D. LEWIS,

President Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas.

A. L. BAKER,

Secretary-Treasurer Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK. ✓

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the consent of the Senate to print in the RECORD a few short letters from presidents of State colleges of agriculture upon Senate bill 3091, which provides for extension work from the land-grant agricultural colleges.

I ask to have these letters printed because I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate on the bill in any way until after the currency bill has been disposed of, and yet I am quite anxious to bring it thoroughly to the attention of those Senators who were not Members of the Senate in the last Congress, that we may be prepared to act promptly upon it and with as little debate as possible after the currency bill has passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The letters were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA,
Tucson, Ariz., September 22, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I sincerely hope that Senate bill 3091, for extension work in agriculture and home economics, may pass the present Congress. The matter has been thoroughly discussed in all its details and should receive prompt and favorable consideration.

The economic results of the extension of education in agriculture and domestic science would be immense. The bill is definite in its statements and is so clearly limited in the range of its work that the public should expect a large degree of efficiency in the administration of the act.

Very truly, yours,

A. H. WILDE, President.

THE CONNECTICUT AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
Storrs, Conn., October 7, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: A considerable fund of useful knowledge has been acquired by the agricultural colleges and experiment stations. Provision should now be made for the diffusion of this practical information among the people of the several States.

Senate bill 3091, providing for cooperative agricultural extension work, should receive early consideration. I hope this bill may be enacted into law during the regular session of the present Congress.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES L. BEACH, President.

UNIVERSITY OF FLORIDA,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Gainesville, Fla., October 7, 1913.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have carefully read Senate bill 3091, which provides for cooperative agricultural extension work by the agricultural colleges of the several States.

It seems to me that just at this time this bill promises larger and more helpful results than any measure of similar character proposed in many years. The greatest need in this territory just now is a vigorous, practical, and consistent propaganda in the fields of agriculture and home economics. The recently inaugurated movement of agricultural extension work would be made doubly more efficient by means of the support which this Senate bill provides. It would result in a tremendous forward step in behalf of the rural population of the country.

I sincerely hope that this bill will speedily become a law.

Very truly, yours,

A. A. MURPHREE, President.

UNIVERSITY OF MAINE,
Orono, Me., September 20, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: I beg to thank you for sending me the copy of the Senate bill 3091.

I have read that bill with very great interest. I am in hearty sympathy with its purpose. I believe thoroughly that the making of this bill into law will do great good. I certainly hope that the measure may be favorably considered in both branches of Congress.

If I can be of any assistance in helping the matter along, I hope you will inform me.

Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT J. ALBY.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
NEW HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE,
Durham, N. H., October 2, 1913.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with great care S. 3091, being a bill to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work.

I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of this bill. Various plans for the betterment of our agricultural conditions have been tried, but none gives such promise of real and actual help as cooperative extension work. Years of experience demonstrate that many of the best things worked out by actual experiment in our agricultural colleges and conveyed to the farmers through bulletins or through farmers' institutes make really little impression. Somehow or in some way the facts, however important, do not lay hold upon the imagination of the average farmer with sufficient force to insure their application. But cooperative work, actual and practical demonstration, where the farmer may see principles demonstrated, is actually effective. For this reason I am heartily in favor of this bill. It properly proposes to share the burden with the State and also is intended to afford a sufficient sum of money to be of real assistance.

An element of peculiar value in this bill is the recognition of the home as the basis of all national well-being. The provision for cooperative work in home economics should by all means be retained.

Very truly, yours,

E. T. FAIRCHILD, President.

THE NORTH CAROLINA COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND MECHANIC ARTS,
West Raleigh, September 20, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMITH: It seems to me that no money could be better spent by our Government than money to promote the cause of agricultural development. The bill introduced by you will be of immense service to the farming interests of the United States. I trust Congress in its wisdom will pass it.

Yours, very truly,

D. H. HILL, President.

THE PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
State College, Pa., September 19, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Senate bill 3091, providing for agricultural and home economics extension work through the State colleges, appeals to me as sane, feasible, and adequate. The need of effort along these lines is generally admitted, the cooperation of the Nation and the several States is likely to produce the most effective agency, and the enactment of this law will lead to systematic, uniform, and widespread effort where only spasmodic and desultory movements have hitherto been produced.

Pennsylvania last winter enacted its first extension law, and this action is a warrant that the State will gladly cooperate with the Nation in furthering this unparalleled public benefit. I sincerely trust the present Congress will signalize its expressed desire to legislate for the public welfare by passing this bill.

Very truly, yours,

EDWIN E. SPARKS.

THE CLEMSON AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
Clemson College, S. C., October 11, 1913.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: In answer to your request of September 17 I beg to say that Senate bill No. 3091, familiarly known as the Smith-Lever extension bill, is, in my mind, one of the most important pieces of constructive legislation ever presented to the Congress of the United States.

In South Carolina, where demonstration and extension work have been closely linked for several years and we have had a chance to judge of the results, we have brought about, even with limited funds, an agricultural transformation that is little short of marvelous. The fact that this small State will this year produce nearly $200,000,000 worth of agricultural products is to some degree a comment on the efficiency of the demonstration and extension work in which the college and the agricultural department are jointly engaged. All that is lacking to make the work effective in every State is proper organization and sufficient money. These are both provided for in the pending bill.

With best wishes for your success, I am,

Yours, very truly,

W. M. RIGGS, President.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE OF UTAH,
Logan, Utah, September 24, 1913.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of September 17 and also a copy of Senate bill 3091. I have examined it and, as I have written you before, I very heartily agree with the provisions of this act. No more important bill for the development of agriculture in our country can be passed than this one. The crying need at the present time is for an easy opportunity of carrying the experiment stations and agricultural colleges directly to the men and women who labor on the farms. Your bill will be a large factor in providing for this.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN A. WIDTSOE, President.

WEST VIRGINIA UNIVERSITY,
Morgantown, October 4, 1913.

Hon. HOKE SMITH, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Let me thank you for the copy of your bill providing for agricultural extension work (S. 3091), which you were so kind as to send me some days ago. I can not think of any other legislation at this time that Congress could enact in the interest of agricultural education that would mean so much as the passage of this bill. In West Virginia we are ready for it and waiting for it. Our State legislature has established in the university a department of agricultural and home economics extension and has given a very liberal appropriation to it. The cooperation of the United States Government contemplated by your bill would be of incalculable value to us, and I am sure the same could be said of every other State as well as of West Virginia.

I hope that you may be successful in securing favorable action upon the bill at an early date.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. E. HODGES.

THE UNIVERSITY OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Laramie, September 23, 1913.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have received a copy of your redraft bill (S. 3091) providing for Federal support of agricultural extension work. This bill is of very great importance to the land-grant colleges of the United States, because its passage would make possible the better development of a form of education greatly needed throughout the country. The State of Wyoming, through the agricultural college of this university, is now spending $5,000 a year for agricultural extension work. This sum enables us to make only a beginning in meeting the needs of the people of the State. I hope Congress will speedily approve your bill.

Very truly,

C. A. DUNIWAY, President.

WORLD'S PURITY FEDERATION.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 125) authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, November 7 to 12, 1913, and I submit a report (No. 120) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and respectfully requested to appoint delegates to attend and represent the United States at the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, November 7 to 12, 1913.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The joint resolution has passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. It carries no appropriation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It carries no appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. FRANK PARKER.

Mr. BRADY. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 746) for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker, and I submit a report (No. 121) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if this is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BRADY. It is not a unanimous report, but it is a favorable report.

Mr. SMOOT. Are any members of the committee opposed to the bill present in the Chamber?

Mr. BRADY. The bill was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is present.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have here an explanation of the bill. I will send it to the desk and it can be read.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina the only reason why I made the inquiry of the Senator from Idaho was that he asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill, and I wished to know if it was unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. As the Senator from Utah knows, it is very difficult to get the unanimous agreement of a committee about anything now, because there are very few members here.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, I will make a brief explanation. What the Senator from Idaho meant is not that there was opposition to the bill, but that in view of the absence of some of the members of the committee all did not approve the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that there was no opposition in the committee to the bill?

Mr. BRADY. There was none, except by one Member, and I understand that he is not going to object to the bill. The committee gave the bill very careful consideration, and practically every member of the committee is in favor of its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I would not object to the present consideration of the bill if it was a unanimous report. The only reason why I called the Senator's attention to the matter was that if there was objection in the committee to the bill and the members objecting to it were not present, then I thought it unwise to ask for unanimous consent for its consideration. But on the explanation of the Senator from Idaho I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that nothing contained in the proviso under the heading "Pay of officers of the line" in the act approved August 24, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," shall be held to apply to the service of Capt. Frank Parker, United States Army, for the period necessary for him to complete his present tour of duty at L'Ecole de Guerre, France.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRADY. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back the bill (S. 528) for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker, with the request that it be postponed indefinitely, as the subject matter is covered by the bill which has just passed the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

HEIRS OF DECEASED INDIANS.

Mr. LANE. I wish to introduce a bill and to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, it being an emergency matter. The discussion of the measure will not take up much time.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that it is a committee report, or is it a bill which the Senator introduces?

Mr. LANE. It is a bill that I introduce.

Mr. SMOOT. That is against the rule of the Senate.

Mr. LANE. I am sorry it is. It is unfortunate, because the bill should be passed. It has been considered by committees. It is in relation to an Indian appropriation. It proposes to assign a special fund of $10,000 out of an appropriation of $50,000 which has already been made for the purpose of carrying out the intent of the measure and the instructions of Congress. Its purpose is to determine who are the heirs to certain land, and in the determination there is a fee fixed upon each allotment by which under this act the Government will secure a profit. It is the one individual case, I presume, which has been presented by which the Government may make a gain. It has been considered by committees and is perfectly legitimate, and it ought to be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever to the consideration of the bill, but I should like to have it considered in its proper order. If the bill has been considered by the committee, I suggest that the Senator introduce it and that it be referred to the committee, and that the committee immediately report it to the Senate, and then he can ask for its immediate consideration. There will be no objection on my part if that course is taken.

Mr. LANE. Very well; let the bill be read and referred.

The bill (S. 3296) to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LANE subsequently said: After conferring with all the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs who are present, I am prepared now to report the bill (S. 3296) which I introduced this morning, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill just reported by him, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to use not to exceed $10,000 for the employment of additional clerks in the Indian Office in connection with the work of determining the heirs of deceased Indians, out of the $50,000 appropriated in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for the purpose of determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees, pursuant to the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 855).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LANE:

A bill (S. 3297) making an appropriation of $750,000 for the construction of a dredger to be used in the improvement of the harbor of the Columbia River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 3298) granting an increase of pension to Olive Ruark (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3299) granting an increase of pension to Leonidas Folckemer (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3300) granting an increase of pension to James Edwards (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 3301) granting a pension to Louis M. Smith (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

IMPORTS AND DUTIES UNDER TARIFF ACT.

Mr. SMOOT. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 192) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a copy of the estimated receipts from customs made by conference committee report on H. R. 3321 for the year 1915, as prepared by experts of the Treasury Department and delivered on or shortly before September 30, 1913, to the Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, showing the estimated amount of imports and duties and ad valorem rates for each of the schedules of the bill; also the total estimated amount of imports and duties with the average ad valorem rate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, ordinarily I do not think any resolution of that sort ought to be passed without going over and being perhaps referred to the committee that has charge of the subject matter; but this seems to me such a simple inquiry for a proper matter of information, if the Senate wants it I will not insist upon what I think should be the usual rule.

Mr. SMOOT. All the resolution calls for is certain information, and I do not see why there should be any objection to its adoption.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RICHARD M. NELSON.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 193), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Richard M. Nelson the sum of $1,200 per annum, same being for services as messenger to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department from August 10, 1913, to —.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 194), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to place upon the rolls of the Senate as messenger to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, from the date of the adoption of this resolution, the name of Richard M. Nelson, such appointment to hold until the election of a chairman of said committee.

THE MEXICAN COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia submitted the following order, which was read:

Ordered, That 4,800 copies of Senate Document No. 305, Sixty-second Congress, second session, Mexican cotton-boll weevil, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This document came from the President of the United States, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. It is a most comprehensive presentation of the investigation by the department of the boll weevil and the remedies that have been successfully used to resist its progress. The edition is exhausted, the copies having been used in the territory in which the boll weevil was at the time progressing, and now I have had calls for the publication from the State entomologists of Georgia and from eastern Alabama and northern Florida, stating that they are exceedingly anxious to put this book into the hands of their instructors.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wish to ask a question to keep the Record straight. Has the Senator an estimate of the cost of the 4,800 copies?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I asked the Printing Office to let me know, and I was informed that this number—4,850—certainly could be printed for $500.

Mr. SMOOT. It will come within the $500 limit?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was advised from the Printing Office it would come within the $500 limit.

The order was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ADDRESS BY GORDON JONES (S. DOC. NO. 212).

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address on some methods of financing the farmer, delivered by Mr. Gordon Jones before the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, the conference of governors at Colorado Springs, and the Colorado Banking Association at Denver. I think it is a very valuable contribution to the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for publication as a public document of the address sent to the desk. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

SENATOR TILLMAN'S RETROSPECT OF 18 YEARS.

Mr. SMOOT. On October 13, at the last meeting of the Senate, I called attention to the printing in the Record of October 7 of certain illustrations, and while I was making the statement the Presiding Officer [Mr. OWEN] stated that he was informed that the matter was to be printed as a public document and that the order to print the cartoons had been reconsidered, and they would not appear in the permanent Record.

I desire to ask the chairman of the Printing Committee [Mr. FLETCHER] if it was his understanding that the action taken on October 9, wherein he asked for a reconsideration of the printing of the cartoons has the effect of preventing them from being printed in the permanent Record. I will call the Senator's attention to the Record.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been requested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to move that the order of the Senate of October 3 providing for the printing as a public document of an article prepared 18 years ago for the New York World, giving the impressions and the then beliefs of Senator TILLMAN about Wall Street and what is called "the money power," be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order of the Senate of October 3 will be reconsidered.

Mr. FLETCHER. On behalf of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and at his request, I offer the following order and ask for its adoption.

There being no objection, the order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

"Ordered, That my remarks of October 3, 1913, together with an article prepared 18 years ago for the New York World, giving the impressions and the then beliefs of Senator TILLMAN about Wall Street and what is called 'the money power,' be printed as a document, with accompanying illustrations."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

Do I understand the chairman of the committee to mean that reconsideration simply allowed the document to be printed as a public document and that in the permanent Record the printing of the cartoons would not be included?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not so understand. When the Senator from South Carolina preferred his request, it was that the illustrations be printed in the Record and also that the article be printed as a public document. That was agreed to. The Senator in that request omitted to ask that the illustrations also be printed; and when the question came as to the printing of the article as a public document, the words "with illustrations" having been omitted, the committee took up the question with the Senator. The object of the reconsideration was to reconsider only that portion of the original request which referred to the printing of the article as a public document. As I stated in my remarks, I moved that the order of the Senate of October 3, providing for the printing as a public document of an article prepared 18 years ago, and so forth, be reconsidered. The action of the Senate in placing the article and illustrations in the Record was not reconsidered, but the action of the Senate in ordering the matter printed as a public document was reconsidered. Then the motion was made to print it as a public document with accompanying illustrations.

Therefore, the purpose of the reconsideration was to have the article printed as a public document with the accompanying illustrations, which language had been omitted in the original order asked for by the Senator from South Carolina. It was simply to cure that defect that the reconsideration was obtained. The reconsideration had no reference to reconsidering the action of the Senate in printing the illustrations in the Record.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is exactly as I understand the Record, and I was quite surprised when the Presiding Officer on October 3 stated that he was informed—there is no doubt he was so informed—that the matter was to be printed as a public document, and that the order to print the cartoons had been reconsidered and they would not appear in the permanent Record.

The object that I have, Mr. President, in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate is this: As I stated the other day, I have not the least objection to the matter being printed with the illustrations as a public document, but I do think it is wrong to allow cartoons of that kind to enter the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I ask the Senator from Utah why?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses agreed, and for the last five or six years have insisted, that cartoons of this character be kept out of the Record. The House has lived strictly to that agreement, and this is the first time since that agreement was made between the two Houses that cartoons of this kind have entered the Record.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is a special case.

Mr. SMOOT. Each cartoon is considered a special case by the one requesting its publication. For instance, the scales used in the weighing of sugar by the Sugar Trust by which the Government was defrauded of millions of dollars was asked to be put into the Record. The request was referred to the Joint Committee on Printing, but not granted.

I remember the Senator from Washington, Mr. Piles, in making a speech on the tariff in 1909 desired that the pictures of a number of shingle mills in the State of Washington be put into the Record. The Joint Committee on Printing decided otherwise, and they were kept out of the Record.

I say to the Senator from South Carolina I do not object at all if he desires that the article with the illustrations be printed as a public document, but I do not believe that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought to be burdened with such cartoons or illustrations of any kind, with the exception of the outline of the map of the United States or a plain diagram used to illustrate some question in a speech that had been delivered.

I now simply call that to the Senator's attention, and I believe that, after due consideration, the Senator will agree that what I have suggested is the proper course, and that the Record is not the place in which illustrations and cartoons should appear.

Mr. TILLMAN. While agreeing to that phase of it, it seems to me that in the interest of the truth of history, as allusions may be made to this public document from time to time, it is only proper that the cartoons should also appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think, Mr. President, the proper place for those cartoons is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As I said before, the article with the illustrations will be printed as a public document, and Senators can refer to that at any time. If the question ever arises in the mind of anyone, and he desires to look this up in the Record, he will find that it was printed as a public document, and all he would have to do would be to ask for and procure a copy of the public document.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is very much easier to look at the index for the cartoons than it is to go and look for them in another book. I insist, if I have a right to insist, that the cartoons shall go into the permanent Record. The Senate has already ordered them there; and unless the Senator from Utah is going to fight this to the bitter end, I want the Senate, just for my sake, to let these cartoons stay in the permanent Record.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to put myself clear on this point. I know how the House feels in relation to it, and I do not want the members of the Joint Committee on Printing of the House to feel that the members of that committee on the part of the Senate have virtually violated the agreement that they had arrived at in relation to the printing of cartoons in the Record.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is an exceptional case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, very many exceptional cases have been brought to the attention of the committee, but we have thought that no case was of sufficient importance that we should encumber the Record with it. For instance, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that only a year ago a Representative from the State of New York delivered what was called "a speech of silence." He had a cartoon, and the exhibition of the cartoon was all that he did in the way of a speech, if a speech it could be called. He insisted that the cartoon was his speech and that it should go into the RECORD. I repeat, the so-called speech was merely a cartoon. It did not appear in the RECORD, and it was right that it should not appear there.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not conceive how you would depict silence except by a blank page.

Mr. SMOOT. I will explain to the Senator that the cartoon was of a large dinner pail with a sentence, I think, printed above it and a sentence below it. The gentleman walked down the aisle, stood in front of the House, and offered that as his speech; but it did not go into the RECORD, as I have said to the Senator. I believe, Mr. President, that the permanent RECORD should not be encumbered with such cartoons; but I shall not ask for a reconsideration of the matter to-day. I am going to say, however, to the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], that at our next meeting I shall bring this question before that committee. If they decide that the cartoons shall go into the permanent RECORD, all well and good; but I want it understood that, so far as I am concerned, I have adhered strictly to our rule, and I believe that the position of the joint committee is correct in keeping cartoons out of the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does not the Senator think that a strict application of the rule would also include maps?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because sometimes, in order to show the division of population and the location of the industries of this country, it is necessary that a map be put into the RECORD; but since the order to which I have referred was agreed to by the Joint Committee on Printing, I will say that this is the first cartoon that has appeared in the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would you exclude maps of other countries?

Mr. SMOOT. We always have done so. The only illustrations that have gone into the RECORD have been outlines of the map of the United States or a plain diagram.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the action of the Senate was had on October 3, and the RECORD shows on page 5381 the request of the Senator from South Carolina, and at the conclusion the following:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina that the matter referred to by him be published in the RECORD and also as a public document? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

That was the action of the Senate. The question of the illustrations went to the Joint Committee on Printing, and the Members of the House who are on that committee as well as those of the Senate took up the question, and the illustrations were ordered inserted with the consent both of the Senate and the House members of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. That was in relation to the public document, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senate had ordered the whole thing printed in the RECORD and also as a public document. The order simply omitted the words "with illustrations" in connection with the printing as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say nothing more about it at this time, but as I have stated I shall bring the matter up in the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing if he proposes to let other Senators have the same privilege, if they desire it, in regard to cartoons illustrating their views?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it is impossible to answer that question. I can only say that the Joint Committee on Printing does not propose to discriminate in any way whatever. The committee must have in view the bulk of the RECORD, the space taken by illustrations, the time required for preparing and getting them in the RECORD, and the fact that the RECORD must be placed on the desks of Senators and Representatives on the morning after the matters which it records take place; so that it may be impossible to allow illustrations from time to time. It depends on the character of the illustrations. In this instance the Senator from South Carolina had the cuts and furnished them himself. They did not have to be made, and no time was required for their preparation. The circumstances will have to control in each instance.

I will say to the Senator that there is a very strong disposition on the part of the Joint Committee on Printing to exclude illustrations wherever we can reasonably do so or wherever they may possibly have the effect of delaying the printing or interfering with the publication of the RECORD.

Mr. BRISTOW. I simply wanted to know, if it is to be the policy of the Senate to permit cartoons, illustrating the ideas of Senators, to go into the RECORD, whether there is going to be any discrimination. Because the cartoons in this instance happen to be in connection with rather a popular issue should not be any reason why they should go in if the privilege is to be denied some other Senator who may have views he desires to illustrate which may not be so popular.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that there is no such policy on the part of the Joint Committee on Printing. I will call his attention again to the fact that the request of the Senator from South Carolina was preferred in the open Senate and that unanimous consent was given by the Senate for the printing of this article with illustrations in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator knows that if I had been present I would have objected to printing the cartoons in the RECORD. I ask the Senate to look at the page of the RECORD containing the cartoons. I can say, Mr. President, that if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is to be filled with cartoons similar to these it will become a very grotesque publication; and I hope that the Senate hereafter will refuse to consent to their being printed in the RECORD, because I think it is absolutely wrong.

IMPORTATION OF GOODS IN AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, with the approaching completion of the Panama Canal, I have received many letters and newspaper clippings urging that the clause in the House tariff bill granting to goods imported in American vessels a rebate of 5 per cent in customs duties is in contravention of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and urging that I use my influence and vote to secure the repeal of the clause.

Mr. President, I have felt that I might respond to my correspondents and also to the country that to my mind there are two ways in which this difficulty might be harmonized and settled, viz, one through the repeal of the clause and the other through the repeal of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I much prefer the latter course. It is suggested that if our bill does not fit the treaty then let us make the treaty to fit our bill. Our cousins on the other side tell us that if we do not repeal this feature "they will not use the canal; they will not play in our back yard any more"; that they will build a canal of their own at Atrato River or at some other place. Godspeed them. Let them build one at every parallel. We will get 50 cents of every dollar they expend, though they do their best. If there is not commercial use enough for them all, they will at least make drainage canals, drying up the swamps and jungles. A year or so ago we were told that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty forbade us from fixing canal tolls that favored our own ships. Now we are told that under this treaty "we can not rebate to shippers freighting in our own ships." Mr. President, I am growing to believe that if some diplomat or foreign sympathizer will look close enough into this Hay-Pauncefote treaty he will discover that we as a nation have no right to exist at all.

The Governments who claim to have a most-favored-nation clause—and most of the foreign nations have such a treaty clause—insist that we have no such right, and, if carried out, they will grant commercial reprisals. Well, let them try it. I think in such a dispute America would at least hold her own. If Germany should elect to try it on, we would shut off her supplies of cotton, copper, phosphates, and so forth. To Great Britain we would give the same medicine. Should South America throw down the gauntlet, we could shut out their coffee and rubber and in a little while ruin would stare them in the face. Japan needs our cotton, and besides this we are her best market. No Senator or citizen desires a commercial or any other kind of war. It is well known, however, that German railways and steamships discriminate in favor of their own commerce and trade. It is a fact that the German Government penalizes Americans who want to buy phosphate, restricting the amount to be purchased, and yet German owners of American phosphate mines carry shipload after shipload from our shores without even a murmur or sign of a protest.

Mr. President, Great Britain makes rebates to her vessels that pass through the Suez Canal; she also grants subsidies to her own ocean craft without let or molestation from us. To-day I have read in the newspapers a quotation from the writings of William W. Bates, who was Commissioner of Navigation under President Cleveland and is a student of this subject. He says:

It is well known that all nations that have entered into conventions with the United States for nonprotection of shipping—for that was their object—have practically repudiated their obligations, finding an advantage in an open commerce but disservice from want of protection. In one way or another an honest fulfillment of obligations has been artfully evaded on their part. They do not return to discriminating duties, but effect their purpose through subsidy, subvention, bounty, or other largess in "aid" of shipping in thorough contempt of convention equities.

Some take these facts for argument for countersubsidizing, but they are legitimate reasons for terminating all our ship conventions and returning to our original policy. Why should we feel bound to keep alive a lapsed and dishonored agreement?

Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Congress of the United States acted both wisely and patriotically when the canal tolls and rebate clauses were adopted as a part of our bill, and I feel like "standing pat" on our action.

Mr. President, I believe I am fair—yes; I know I am fair. I want no unfair advantage over any man or nation; but when it comes to the management of our own internal affairs, I say to the world, "Hands off!"

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit an amendment in the form of a bill, or a bill in the form of an amendment, which I propose to offer as a substitute for Senate bill 136, which by unanimous consent is made a special order for to-day at the conclusion of the routine morning business. I ask to have the substitute printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have printed in bill form Senate bill 136, together with the substitute which I have proposed, one in roman and the other in small capitals, showing the changes which the substitute makes in the bill as reported by the committee. I ask to have it printed in bill form. It will be a great convenience to the Senate in considering the relation of the different sections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

CONFEDERATE STOCKADE CEMETERY, JOHNSTONS ISLAND, OHIO.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration Order of Business No. 73, being the bill (S. 2374) providing for the care of the Confederate Stockade Cemetery, Johnstons Island, in Sandusky Bay. It is a purely local bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill or any other bill which may be taken up as a part of the routine business, if it is not an impairment of the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into for the consideration of the seamen's bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is not closed. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not wish to object at this time. I wish to ask the Senator, however, in what way has this cemetery been cared for in the past?

Mr. POMERENE. During the war a prison for Confederate officers was established on this island, and for a long time it was privately owned, as I understand. A few years ago the Robert Patton Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy acquired title to the cemetery, and it has been cared for by private subscription. In this work there has been joint action between the Robert Patton Chapter and members of the Grand Army of the Republic located in Sandusky. Among the men who have been very specially interested in this matter is the Hon. John A. Mack, who is one of the leading citizens of the State of Ohio, a Republican, and an active member of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if the title to the cemetery is in the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. It is not, if the Senator please. There are, I think, four or five other Confederate cemeteries in the Northern States the title to which has been acquired by the Government; but in view of the fact that this title was acquired by the Robert Patton Chapter they have declined, for reasons of their own, to convey it to the Government. The matter has been submitted to the Secretary of War, however, and he recommends this appropriation notwithstanding the fact that the title is not in the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is quite a departure from all of our past customs to make an appropriation to take care of any property that does not belong to the Government of the United States. I have not the least objection to the appropriation for the cemetery. The object is a worthy one. I really believe, however, that it would be very much better to have the title to the cemetery transferred to the United States before we make any appropriation for it.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize the fact that there is room for difference of opinion upon that subject, and ordinarily I should acquiesce in the view of the Senator from Utah. It seems to me, however, that this is an exceptional case. This cemetery for many years was neglected, until the matter was taken up by private parties. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to let the bill go over to-day, and I will talk to him further about it. There are a number of questions I should like to ask him, and perhaps they would unnecessarily consume the time of the Senate now. I should like to have the bill go over to-day.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I understand this is an appropriation for this year only, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; it is a continuing appropriation.

Mr. POMERENE. It is a continuing appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to be made each year hereafter.

Mr. POMERENE. To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BACON. Thinking it was an annual appropriation, I was going to suggest that it might be made for this year and the question of which the Senator speaks might be taken up hereafter. I really think it ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I do, too.

Mr. BACON. Johnstons Island is a very noted place and, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, for a long number of years the care of these graves has been not a little neglected. It was only after private individuals interested themselves in the cemetery that any attention whatever was paid to it. It seems to me that after all this long period of neglect it is as little as the Government can do to make this very small appropriation for the care of the cemetery.

There is practically no reason in this case why the question of title should be important. It is important as to every piece of property upon which the Government is to make expenditures, such as sites for post-office buildings, or forts, or anything else. In such cases it is a general provision of law that the Government must have title; but there is no manner in which the question of this title will ever be raised in such a way as to jeopardize any interest of the United States. It is, at last, a simple question of the care of these graves, whether the title is in the Government or in private individuals.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the idea I had in mind was that as long as the property is in private ownership we will never know into whose hands it is going to fall. As long as private individuals have the title they can do with it anything they desire. It is my opinion, of course, that the property ought to remain as a cemetery and be taken care of by the Government as a noted place in the history of this country; but I do think the only proper way to accomplish that would be to have the title to the property in the name of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if this cemetery were in reality owned by private parties I certainly should agree with the Senator from Utah; but the title is in the Daughters of the Confederacy. It is a cemetery. There are 153 marked graves and 53 unmarked graves in it. I can not conceive that property of this character could be or would be used for any other purpose than a cemetery. It has been cared for each year as Decoration Day came around by the comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic in that vicinity. Necessarily we would all feel and do feel that it ought to be cared for.

Mr. BACON. If the time ever comes when it is devoted to any other purpose, it will be a very easy matter to withdraw the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia, that the appropriation be made for this year only, is a wise one. If made for this year, I think the estimate ought to be made by the War Department each year hereafter, and it ought to come in the regular appropriation bill. I think that would be the proper way to proceed, to provide for the care of that cemetery the same as we appropriate for all the other cemeteries.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator must have misunderstood me. I did not suggest that that be done. I simply stated that I understood that it was that way in the bill. I think it is very much better that it should be a continuing appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. POMERENE. Would it meet the objection of the Senator from Utah if there were a provision inserted in the bill to the effect that this appropriation should be continued only so long as the property should be used for cemetery purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe it would ever be continued longer than the property should be used for cemetery purposes. I believe the law would be repealed, as the Senator suggests; so I have no objection as far as that is concerned.

In view of the fact that I am in favor of the object of the bill, although I believe it ought to be reached in a different way, and since the Senators seem so deeply interested in it, I shall not object to its present consideration. I do wish to say, however, that I hope this will never be taken as a precedent for appropriating money to take care of property not owned by the Government of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the words "direction of the," to strike out "War Department" and insert "Secretary of War," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated each year, beginning July 1, 1913, the sum of $250 for the care and maintenance of the Confederate Stockade Cemetery, Johnstons Island, in Sandusky Bay, out of funds not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the unanimous-consent agreement that immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day the Senate would proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 136. I therefore ask that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 136.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States, to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto, and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have the bill read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections."

Sec. 2. That in all merchant vessels of the United States the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; but this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or the following named legal holidays: New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Good Friday, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Thanksgiving, Election Day, and Christmas, but this provision shall not prevent the doing of work necessary to the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage. At all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor, nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section, the seaman shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and to receive the wages earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels, yachts, vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours: Provided, That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours, except in cases of emergency as hereinbefore provided. But this exemption shall in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor.

Sec. 3. That section 4520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4520. The master or owner of any vessel making coasting voyages shall pay to every seaman his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped, or at the time such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in case of vessels making foreign voyages, within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged, or within four days after the seaman has been discharged, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall be entitled to be paid at the time of his discharge on account of wages a sum equal to one-third part of the balance due him. Every master or owner who refuses or neglects to make payment in the manner hereinbefore mentioned without sufficient cause shall pay to the seaman a sum equal to two days' pay for each and every day during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods, which sum shall be recoverable as wages in any claim made before the court; but this section shall not apply to masters or owners of any vessel the seamen of which are entitled to share in the profits of the cruise or voyage."

Sec. 4. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States which, prior to the completion of her voyage, shall enter any port for the purpose of loading or delivering cargo shall, upon demand made subsequent to entering such port, be entitled to receive from the master of the vessel to which he belongs, within 48 hours after demand therefor, one-half part of the wages which he shall have earned at said port, and all stipulations of contract to the contrary shall be null and void: Provided, That wages earned during the first five days of service shall not be due or subject to demand prior to the completion of the voyage or expiration of contract. When the voyage is ended, every seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due to him as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes. This section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts: Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels owned in major part by American citizens, corporations, or holding companies when such vessels are in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

Sec. 5. That the second paragraph of section 4552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 4552. Second. Such release, so signed and attested, shall operate as a mutual discharge and settlement of all demands for wages between the parties thereto, on account of wages, in respect of the past voyage or engagement: Provided, That any court having competent jurisdiction may, upon good cause shown, set aside such release and take such action as justice may require."

Sec. 6. That section 4559 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4559. Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel, while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon in any of these or like cases the consular or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section."

Sec. 7. That places appropriated and used upon all merchant vessels of the United States as a lodging for crews shall be properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from sea and weather, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvia of the cargo or bilge water; and every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of any of the crew occupying said place during the voyage; that on all merchant vessels of the United States, the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of any class of less than 200 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel for lodgings shall have a space of not less than 120 cubic feet and not less than 18 square feet, measured on the floor or deck, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein: Provided, That these space allotments may be reduced not more than 20 per cent in case a separate space is provided for mess-room purposes.

That in addition to the space allotment for lodgings hereinbefore provided on all merchant vessels of the United States which in the ordinary course of their trade make voyages of more than three days' duration between ports, and which carry a crew of 12 or more seamen, there shall be constructed a compartment, suitably separated from other spaces, for hospital purposes, and such compartment shall have at least one bunk for every 12 seamen, constituting her crew, provided that not more than six bunks shall be required in any case.

The spaces for the crew shall have wooden flooring, or be covered with some substance impervious to water and a nonconductor of heat and which may be easily cleaned. The sides and ceilings shall be painted in a light oil color, and iron ceilings or walls, if used, must be provided with a covering which will prevent dripping. Each seaman or apprentice shall be allowed a berth at least 2 feet in width and 6 feet in length for his sole use, and the distance between the floor and the bottom of the lower berth shall be at least 10 inches, and not more than two berths shall be in a tier.

Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section, so far as they are applicable thereto, by providing sleeping room in the engine room of such steamboat, properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated.

Every merchant vessel of the United States, the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, having exclusive of licensed officers a deck crew of 20 or more men (except fishing vessels, yachts, pilot boats, and vessels of less than 200 gross tons), shall have for the use of the sailors at least one light, clean, and properly ventilated wash room, which shall be provided with not less than one washbasin for each two men of a watch, except those for whom individual washing accommodations are provided elsewhere. A special wash room shall be provided for the firemen, provided that their number is not less than 10, exclusive of licensed officers, so situated that the men can reach it on the way from the engine rooms, boiler rooms, or coal bunkers before entering their quarters, and of such size that at least half the watch can wash at the same time. It shall be provided with at least one shower bath for each four men of the watch, and with at least one washbasin for each two men of the watch, except those for whom individual washing and bathing accommodations are provided elsewhere. The sides and ceilings of all wash rooms shall be painted in light oil color. The wash rooms shall be supplied with sufficient quantities of soap and running water, both hot and cold wherever practicable, and in the case of firemen at least 2 gallons of fresh water shall be available for the use of each man at the end of his watch. Wash rooms shall be cleaned at least once each day.

The equipment hereinbefore provided for shall be certified to by the local inspectors at each annual inspection.

Any failure to comply with this section shall subject the owner or owners of such vessels to a penalty of not less than $50 nor more than $500.

Sec. 8. That section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4596. Whenever any seaman or apprentice lawfully engaged on any merchant vessel of the United States commits any of the following offenses he shall be punished as follows:

"First. For desertion by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

"Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel, or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

"Third. For quitting the vessel without leave, after her arrival at the port of delivery, and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay.

"Fourth. For willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture from his wages of not more than four days' pay or, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than one month.

"Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than 3 months, at the discretion of the court.

"Sixth. For assaulting any master or other licensed officer by imprisonment for not more than two years.

"Seventh. For willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo, by forfeiture out of his wages of a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than 12 months.

"Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage, and the whole or any part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, and he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months."

SEC. 9. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where seamen or officers are accused the consular officer shall inquire into the facts and proceed as provided in section 4583 of the Revised Statutes; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew list and shipping articles and official log the cause of such discharge and the particulars in which the cruel or unusual treatment consisted and subscribe his name thereto officially. He shall read the entry made in the official log to the master, and his reply thereto, if any, shall likewise be entered and subscribed in the same manner."

SEC. 10. That section 4611 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable, provided he has actual knowledge of the misdemeanor or complaint thereof is made within three days after reaching port. Any failure on the part of such master to use due diligence to comply herewith, which failure shall result in the escape of such officer, shall render the master or owner of the vessel liable in damages for such flogging or corporal punishment to the person illegally punished by such officer."

SEC. 11. That section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended as regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of 4 quarts of water there shall be a requirement of 5 quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requirement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day.

SEC. 12. That section 24 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That section 10 of chapter 121 of the laws of 1884, as amended by section 3 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10 (a). That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages to any other person, or to give any order, note, or other evidence of indebtedness of any kind whatsoever, or for any purpose, conditioned directly or indirectly on the deduction of the amount specified from the wages of a seaman, except as hereinafter provided.

"Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case except as herein provided absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment, or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from taking employment on board any vessel, or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from remaining in the service of any vessel on which he has shipped, or by any threat or force induce or compel any person to disregard or disobey any lawful order or orders of the master or other licensed officer of the vessel on which he is shipped, he shall for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500.

"(b) That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children.

"(c) That no allotment shall be valid unless in writing and signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law. All stipulations for the allotment of any part of the wages of a seaman during his absence which are made at the commencement of the voyage shall be inserted in the agreement and shall state the amounts and times of the payments to be made and the persons to whom the payments are to be made.

"(d) That no allotment except as provided for in this section shall be lawful. Any person who shall falsely claim to be such relation, as above described, of a seaman under this section shall for every such offense be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

"(e) That this section shall apply as well to seamen engaged in ports of the United States for service on foreign vessels as to seamen employed on vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation.

"The master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel seeking clearance from a port of the United States shall present his shipping articles, so far as they relate to the engagement of seamen in the United States or a certified copy of the same, at the office of clearance, and no clearance shall be granted any such vessel unless the provisions of this paragraph have been complied with.

"(f) That under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the Commissioner of Navigation shall make regulations to carry out this section."

SEC. 13. That section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4536. No wages due or accruing to any seaman or apprentice shall be subject to attachment or arrestment from any court, and every payment of wages to a seaman or apprentice shall be valid in law, notwithstanding any previous sale or assignment of wages or of any attachment, encumbrance, or arrestment thereon; and no assignment or sale of wages or of salvage made prior to the accruing thereof shall bind the party making the same, except such allotments as are authorized by this title. This section shall apply to fishermen employed on fishing vessels as well as to seamen: Provided, That nothing contained in this or any preceding section shall interfere with the order by any court regarding the payment by any seaman of any part of his wages for the support and maintenance of his wife and minor children."

SEC. 14. That no vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen, in any department, to whom such orders are given. The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

No vessel, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient number of efficient lifeboat hands, which in no case shall be less than two for each lifeboat that such ship is required to carry, to launch and handle the prescribed lifeboats and life rafts.

A seaman shall be entitled to the rating of efficient lifeboat hand who has shown by practical tests to the satisfaction of the board of local inspectors that he is qualified to perform any duty required in the launching and handling of lifeboats and life rafts and their equipment, including the stowing of passengers, swinging out, lowering, detaching and hoisting, and use of oars. Such tests shall be subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, who shall, through collectors of customs, local inspectors, and other officers of the Government enforce the laws and regulations for the handling of lifeboats and life rafts and the efficiency of lifeboat hands.

This section shall take effect on and after the following dates, respectively, in the case of vessels navigating the ocean or sounds and bay connected therewith or the Great Lakes and connecting waters, and authorized by certificate of inspection to carry the following number of passengers:

On July 1, 1913, 500 passengers or over;
On August 1, 1913, 200 passengers and less than 500;
On October 1, 1913, less than 200.

Any violation of any provision of this section shall subject the master or owner of such vessel to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

SEC. 15. A seaman shall not be entitled to the rating of A. B.—that is to say, of an able-bodied seaman—unless he is at least 18 years of age, possesses a sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the necessary orders that may be given to him in the course of the performance of his duties, and has served on deck at sea for at least three years. The service herein prescribed may be proved by certificates of discharge by a master before a shipping commissioner or by other proof satisfactory to officers designated by the Secretary of Commerce, who shall issue certificates to able-bodied seamen in a form to be prescribed by him, and in the case of seamen shipped abroad on vessels of the United States, such service may be proved by certificates of discharge by a master before consuls of the United States.

No vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have as part of her crew a sufficient number of wheelmen or quartermasters and lookout men of not less rating than that of able seaman: Provided, That upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce, as to eyesight, hearing, and physical strength and knowledge of the duties, men found competent may be so employed, although they may have served only one year at sea, and no other men than those so qualified shall be employed at the wheel or as lookout. And while at sea the wheelmen or quartermasters and lookout men shall be divided into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively; but this requirement shall not apply to yachts, vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours: Provided, That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours except in case of emergency. But this exemption shall in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor.

Any failure to comply with this provision shall subject the master or owner of such vessel to a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500.

SEC. 16. That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow for 50 miles or more through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

SEC. 17. That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of the United States in foreign countries, and for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, ought to be terminated, and to this end the President be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, within 90 days after the passage of this act to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, that so much as hereinbefore described of all such treaties and conventions between the United States and foreign Governments will terminate on the expiration of such periods after notices have been given as may be required in such treaties and conventions.

SEC. 18. That upon the expiration after notice of the periods required, respectively, by said treaties and conventions and of one year in the case of the independent State of the Congo, so much as hereinbefore described in each and every one of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and to be of no force and effect, and thereupon so much of sections 4081 and 5280 of the Revised Statutes as relates to the arrest or imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, shall be and is hereby repealed.

SEC. 19. That this act shall take effect, as to all vessels of the United States, 90 days after its passage, and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, save and except that such parts hereof as provide for the abrogation of any stipulation by treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall only take effect after such notice, and at the expiration of such time as may be required by the terms of such treaty, stipulation, or convention.

SEC. 20. That section 16 of the act approved December 21, 1898, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," be amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"Provided, That at the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, if any seaman incapacitated from service by injury or illness is on board a vessel so situated that a prompt discharge requiring the personal appearance of the master of the vessel before an American consul or consular agent is impracticable, such seaman may be sent to a consul or consular agent, who shall care for him and defray the cost of his maintenance and transportation, as provided in this paragraph."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this bill is identical with a bill which passed both Houses of Congress at the last session and went to the President just before the end of the Congress—I believe on the last day. The President stated that he did not have sufficient time to examine the measure, and therefore he did not feel, on account of its great importance, that he would be justified in giving it his approval. The bill had come from the House, was referred to the Commerce Committee, was reported by the Commerce Committee to the Senate with some amendments, and was amended in the Senate. It then went to the House, and the House accepted the bill as it came from the Senate and as amended in the Senate, and this bill, S. 136, is the bill which met with the final approval of both Houses of Congress and went to the President.

This bill, together with Senate bill No. 4 and Senate bill No. 2221, was introduced at this extra session and referred to the Committee on Commerce and by that committee referred to a subcommittee. The subcommittee reported back to the full committee in favor of S. 136. Finally the full committee reported to the Senate S. 136, with the understanding that any member of the committee would be at perfect liberty to favor any amendment that might be offered which in his judgment improved the measure, and that in the judgment of the committee a statement should be made when the bill was reported to the Senate that action ought to be deferred until the regular session. That statement was made, and subsequently the Senate, by unanimous consent, made this bill the unfinished business, and it is therefore now before the Senate.

There are objections to S. 136. Perhaps no bill could be introduced here and be referred to a committee and be considered for any length of time without developing some objections. Especially is this true with an important measure like this, because it is very important, affecting not only the rights and interests of the seamen engaged in our merchant marine, but affecting likewise the rights and interests of the shipowners, and very materially; and it is in this light that I am inclined to regard it in preference to the others, although not disregarding the rights of either of the other interests, especially the great public which does business with these ships and whose lives and property are in the keeping of these men who "go down to the sea in ships."

There are, as I stated, features in this bill which unquestionably could be improved upon in the interest of the great public and certainly in the interest of the seamen engaged in our merchant marine.

I call attention very briefly to these, because when the bill is taken up for full consideration and discussion it will be worth while perhaps to keep these matters in mind. There are many features in Senate bill 136 that are entirely agreeable both to the seamen and to the shipowners. It is a long step in advance and in the right direction. It is a most important measure considered in the light of recent experiences on the seas and in view of our great mercantile marine interests. There are some features in the bill which do not meet with the approval of the seamen and there are some features in it which do not meet with the approval of the shipowners. Altogether, I may say, I think fairly, that Senate bill 136 is rather a compromise, and at the same time beyond any question it would be very desirable legislation. If it can be improved upon, no one upon the committee is committed to it to such an extent that he is bound not to accept any improvement or suggestion that would be of value.

For instance, on page 3 of the bill it will be insisted that after the word "yacht" at the end of line 6 the remainder of that section of the bill should be stricken out.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Florida please state again the reference?

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 3, after the word "yacht," in line 6, down to the end of the section concluding with the word "labor."

It will be contended, I will say, that that portion of the bill should be stricken out. This section prohibits the lake custom of transferring men from the deck to the fireroom when out on the lakes and regulates the hours at sea and in port, so that the sailor shall not work more than 12 hours in 24 and the fireman 8 hours in 24 at sea, 9 hours to be 1 day's work in port, and no unnecessary work is to be done on Sundays and legal holidays.

This proviso, however, contains limitations and exceptions which impair that feature of the bill. It is claimed by those who have studied the subject, and those objections will be urged. The proviso exempts vessels of less than 300 gross tons or vessels whose regular schedules between terminal ports do not exceed 24 hours. It will be insisted that the portion of the section beginning after the word "yachts," in line 6, page 3, to the end should be stricken out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is that—merely the proviso?

Mr. FLETCHER. A part of it is the proviso, and the other language is:

Vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours.

Those words immediately precede the proviso. Those are exceptions. Then it is provided that section 2 shall not apply to fishing vessels, whaling vessels, or yachts. Then this language follows:

Vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours.

This language places a limitation on the other provisions of that section.

On page 5 it will be insisted that the proviso there, beginning with the word "Provided," in line 1, and ending with the word "contract," in line 4, should be stricken out, for the reason that it provides "that wages earned during the first five days of service shall not be due or subject to demand prior to the completion of the voyage or expiration of contract," voyages on the Lakes not extending over that period of time. This section has reference to the right of the seaman to demand his wages or a portion of his wages before the termination of the voyage; and the proviso takes out of that the Lake business because, I repeat, such voyages do not exceed five days.

The other proviso exempts foreign vessels unless owned in major part by American citizens, corporations, or holding companies. That will be objected to and subject to very considerable criticism. The lake business is different from the business on the ocean; but at the same time the question is whether lake ships and vessels should be exempted entirely from the right of the seamen to demand wages as provided for in this section.

On page 7, line 7, after the word "of," down to and including the end of that sentence, embracing the words—

Not less than 120 cubic feet and not less than 18 square feet, measured on the floor or deck, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein: Provided, That these space allotments may be reduced not more than 20 per cent in case a separate space is provided for mess-room purposes—

Will be criticized.

There is perhaps no real objection to that provision in the bill, but at the same time it provides for taking off 20 per cent of space for a mess room, and in promising a wash room it limits that provision to vessels having 20 or more men on deck. Those vessels are comparatively few.

The following provision to that refers to the hospital, more or less important, perhaps, and the location of the fore-castle would be really important, but that is not asked for by the seamen, as I understand. They are very much more interested in keeping living accommodations for the well than hospitals for the sick. The first will very much lessen the need for the other.

Then, on page 11 of the bill, objection will be made to the provision in line 16, where the words "or other licensed officer" are used, because that is rather broad language. It is perfectly well known that the mate is in command of the vessel when the master is either absent from the deck or from the vessel. Therefore, in reference to an assault on the officer in command, which is sought to be dealt with, it is suggested that the word "mate" should be used instead of the words "or other licensed officer."

On page 13, line 15, after the word "practicable," objection will be made to the language:

Provided he has actual knowledge of the misdemeanor, or complaint thereof is made within three days after reaching port.

It will be contended—and there is considerable reason for that—that the master of the vessel ought to control the situation, so that when the assault, if an assault is made, upon a seaman by an officer of the vessel the master would guarantee that that officer would be accessible when the vessel docked, so that whatever rights the seaman had could be readily enforced. It is contended that this is a limitation on the remedy given for flogging and other forms of corporal punishment. It provides that the master must have "actual knowledge of the misdemeanor, or complaint thereof be made within three days after reaching port." It is a qualification likely to result in the vessel and the offender escaping all liability. Criticism will be made of that provision, and it is worth considering as we proceed with the bill.

On page 15, line 15, it is claimed that this exception will cause great injustice to seamen who, if arrested under this proposed law, may and will be held in prison for months before being tried; at least, it will be contended that is the danger; it will also be contended that it will be the cause of useless expense to the Government, because the witnesses must be kept and paid, and so forth, and that local laws will deal with that situation in a way that will make unnecessary that provision in the bill.

The principal criticism of the pending bill, I believe, will be made to section 14, which, with section 15, corresponds to section 12 in Senate bill 4, which passed the House about a year ago and in practically the same terms and in its present form was introduced here and referred to the committee which had all these three bills under consideration. The provision at page 18 of the present bill, in line 13, beginning after the word "vessel," employs this language:

Unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen, in any department, to whom such orders are given. The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

It is also provided that there shall be three watches for the helmsmen and lookout men. This provision puts a hardship on small vessels. It prevents the training of boys, because most of the vessels carry no more than six men, and by applying this provision to foreign vessels it is claimed that it will interfere with those vessels when beyond the jurisdiction of our laws.

This section particularly, with section 15, is intended to "afford a standard of efficiency." Whether or not this language test, as it is sometimes called, goes too far in Senate bill 4, and whether or not it is too much modified and qualified and really made ineffective by this provision are matters for very serious consideration.

We have a standard of efficiency in a great many industries. For instance, under State laws a standard of efficiency as to miners; a standard of efficiency as to those who operate automobiles, and in some States even as to barbers, and why should there not be a standard of efficiency for the men who are engaged in this great business conducted on the high seas?

The point will be raised that it is just as essential for safety at sea to have capable and competent men who are in a position to receive and to understand the orders of their officers as it is important to have lifeboats or equipment so as to take care of the passengers and crew in case of accident or disaster.

This is a very important section of the bill, and will be, of course, given most careful consideration. There will be, I take it, no question raised as to sections 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the bill. So far as I am advised, those sections are really an improvement on like provisions in either of the other bills that were before the committee, and I think they put in better form the denunciation of treaties and the repeal of existing laws than any of the other bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not quite understand the Senator's statement about section 14. What changes in section 14 are proposed to be made by the substitute?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the substitute as offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] this morning has not been printed, but I take it will conform very largely to Senate bill No. 4, inasmuch as that bill was introduced by him. Senate bill No. 4 provides that 75 per cent of the crew in each department of the vessel must understand the orders given by the officers; that a percentage, beginning at 40 per cent and ending at 65 per cent, of the deck crew, exclusive of officers, shall be men having three years' experience; and that there must be two such men for each lifeboat in vessels carrying passengers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was interested, Mr. President, to understand what change is made with reference to the provision that 75 per cent of the crew shall be able to understand an order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have just stated what the provision of Senate bill No. 4 is in that connection and, perhaps, the provision in the substitute which will be offered. The bill we have before us, Senate bill No. 136, provides for the crew understanding the orders, but makes an exception if there are men who can act as interpreters and communicate the orders given by the officers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the proposed substitute omits that exception. Is that correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. It does. Senate bill 136 provides that—

Not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision beginning with the words "unless the crew shall include," and so on, is omitted from the substitute?

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it the substitute will contain a somewhat different provision from that, because Senate bill No. 4 is different from that. Senate bill No. 4 provides that 75 per cent of the crew in each department of the vessel must understand the orders given by the officers, and that a percentage, beginning at 40 per cent and ending at 65 per cent, of the deck crew, exclusive of officers, shall be men having three years' experience. It is different from the proposition here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seemed to me as the section was read that the provision which the Senator has read, beginning with the words "unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen," and so on, furnishes rather an indefinite test which, it occurs to me, would be almost incapable of practical enforcement. The provision reads:

Unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen.

Certainly, that is not a very definite test. It is a matter about which people would differ very much. One man might think that 10 seamen were enough, another might think that not less than 20 seamen would be sufficient, and so on.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will admit that is an objection to this language. The object here, I take it, is to relieve the necessity of the seamen being able to understand the language of the officer and permit a sufficient number of interpreters being engaged who will transmit the orders of the officers to the seamen. That is the purpose of that provision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is couched in such very general and indefinite terms—

Mr. BURTON. I should really like to hear this conversation. I am unable to hear, especially the questions and suggestions made by the able Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The suggestion I was making to the Senator from Florida was that the language, beginning on page 18, line 13, which seems to be a limitation upon the provision of the section with reference to employing 75 per cent of the crew who can understand the language of an order, furnishes a test that is practically incapable of enforcement. It is a matter about which people would differ. I understand that this is a penal law, the violation of which would subject a man to punishment.

Suppose a man were arrested charged with violating that provision and his defense were that the crew did include a sufficient number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers might be communicated. The provision is so indefinite, it seems to me, that it would be quite incapable of practical enforcement.

When you say that 75 per cent or any other per cent—50 per cent or 60 per cent—of the men must understand the language of an order, that is definite; that can be enforced; that is understood by all men exactly alike. But when you put a limitation upon it to the effect that that is not necessary where a sufficient number of seamen understand the language of those through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated different people would differ as to what would constitute a sufficient number. There is absolutely no test laid down. Are 10 sufficient out of a crew of 500, or would it require 50 out of a crew of 500?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not in a position to differ with the criticism of the Senator from Utah as to that language.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to suggest that that seems to be cleared up somewhat by the last sentence of the section:

The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. That puts a minimum limitation upon it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That puts a minimum limitation upon it, but it does not do away with the first requirement as to a "sufficient number." If it had said that the number should be equivalent to the number of lifeboats, then we would have had some test; but to say that it shall not be less does not mean that it shall not be more in order to constitute a "sufficient number."

Mr. THOMAS. I think that suggestion is an appropriate one.

Mr. FLETCHER. The present bill also provides a standard of efficiency, but it makes the number the same for all vessels above 300 gross tons. It provides for two skilled men to each lifeboat, but permits them to be taken from any part of the vessel, thus leaving only two; while the substitute, as I understand—Senate bill 4 does, anyhow—takes them from the deck department, and then utilizes such boatmen as may be found in any other department.

A lifeboat crew is from five to nine, and two is the very least number of really skilled men needed. The others ought to have such skill as can be obtained by drills on board passenger vessels.

That is the important section relating to the question of efficiency, and, of course, is one of the most important in the bill.

Mr. President, I did not intend to enter upon any discussion of the bill; but I thought at this time it was well to point out what I understand to be some of the vulnerable points in the bill, some of the points which have subjected it to criticism, and which I believe to be points of attack against the bill, and call attention to them. The other features of the bill, I believe, are largely approved by experts and all parties concerned. As I said a moment ago, the sections beginning with 17 and going to the conclusion are very much better than the like sections in any of the other bills that were before the committee.

I ask permission to insert here a copy of a memorial or argument submitted by the International Seamen's Union of America, addressed to the President, a copy of which has been sent to me. It discusses some of the legal questions involved and presents the matter from that standpoint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To the President:

The undersigned, the International Seamen's Union of America, respectfully brings to your attention the following conditions of fact and law and respectfully bases on such conditions the petition wherewith this paper concludes:

1. STATEMENT OF FACTS.

"Chinese persons" and "persons of Chinese descent," not being "officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure," and not being "Chinese laborers in transit across the territory of the United States in the course of their journey to or from other countries," and not being Chinese laborers once lawfully within territory of the United States and having return privileges, are habitually engaged in seaports of Asia for service as seamen aboard ships of American register, and habitually serve as seamen on board such ships in their voyaging between the Orient and ports of the United States.

Consular officers of the United States, in dealing with vessels and crews of vessels, make no distinction between Chinese persons who are seamen and other persons who are seamen.

Officers of the Department of Commerce and Labor charged with the duty of executing the Chinese-exclusion laws of this country treat such Chinese seamen as lawfully on board such ships.

II. STATEMENT OF LAW.

(a) The statutory law does not include seamen among the classes of Chinese persons expressly permitted to enter or to reside within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Section 2 of the Chinese-exclusion act of September 13, 1888, provides "that Chinese officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure shall be permitted to enter the United States," etc., in terms following the language of treaty.

It is needless for the purpose of this petition to cite the statutory provisions affecting Chinese persons in transit or the provisions affecting Chinese having "return" privilege.

Noninclusion of seamen among the classes mentioned in the quoted section of the act of 1888 is not altered by any express provision of that or any other statute or by any treaty.

(b) Judicial construction of the statutory law has not enlarged, by doctrines of implication, by considerations as to treaties, or otherwise, the number or extended the literal limits of the classes of Chinese persons permitted by such statutory law to enter or to reside within the jurisdiction of the United States.

In the case of Ah Fawn (57 Fed. Rep., p. 591) the intent of China and the United States in that treaty definition of "exempted classes," which has been incorporated into section 2 of the act of 1888, was directly considered, with this result: That the court concluded the mention of classes who might come was designated to exclude from free immigration privileges all Chinese persons not officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure.

So in the case of Lee Ah Yin v. The United States (116 Fed. Rep., p. 614) the circuit court of appeals, ninth circuit, cites approvingly the decision in the case of Ah Fawn and holds that by excluding "laborers" from free immigration privilege China and the United States in treaties, and the United States in statutes, intended to exclude "all immigration to the United States from China other than that of the privileged classes who were by the terms of the treaty permitted to come for purposes of teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity."

(c) The executive departments of the Federal Government accept and act upon the strict construction principle laid down in the cited decisions except as to seamen.

"The true theory of the Federal law," said the Attorney General in an opinion rendered July 15, 1898, "is not that all Chinese persons may enter this country who are not forbidden, but that only those may enter who are expressly allowed."

Rules of the Department of Commerce and Labor are to the same effect, save that they expressly except seamen from the Chinese "laborers" forbidden to reside within American territory. (See rules 1, 15, and 16, relating to the exclusion of Chinese.)

(d) A vessel of the United States is territory of the United States.

"An American vessel," said Justice Field in the case of Ah Sing (13 Fed. Rep., p. 286), "is deemed to be a part of the territory of the State within which its home port is situated, and as such a part of the territory of the United States."

This is the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States in Crapo v. Kelly (83 U. S., p. 430) and in Wilson v. McNamee (102 U. S., p. 234). From the opinion of Justice Hunt, in the earlier case, this interesting statement is quoted:

"In the celebrated Trent case, occurring in 1862, Messrs. Mason and Sildell were removed from a British private vessel by Commodore Wilkes, of the San Jacinto, a public vessel of the United States. Great Britain insisted that the rights of a neutral vessel not only had been violated, for which she demanded apology, but she insisted that these persons should be replaced and returned on board a British ship. This was done, and they were actually placed on board a British vessel in or near the harbor of Boston. They were not British subjects, and their return could only have been demanded for the reason that they had been torn from British soil, and the sanctity of British soil as represented by a British ship had been violated. Citizenship or residence had no influence upon the question."

(e) When a Chinese person is on board a vessel of the United States, he is in territory of the United States.

A Chinese laborer lawfully within the United States shipped in San Francisco as a seaman on board a vessel of the United States. After a voyage to New South Wales he was denied the right to land in San Francisco, the claim being made that having gone with his ship to a foreign port he had brought himself within the prohibitions attaching under our exclusion laws to Chinese persons who had left the territory of this country. This denial of right was held unlawful in the case of Ah Sing (13 Fed. Rep., p. 286), the Federal circuit court ruling that the seaman, having remained with his ship, had not left American territory.

The same doctrine was applied in the subsequent case of Ah Tie and others (13 Fed. Rep., p. 292).

(f) A vessel of the United States being territory of the United States, and a Chinese person on board a vessel of the United States being in territory of the United States, a Chinese person having no right to be in territory of the United States has no right to serve as a seaman on board a vessel of the United States.

So far as your petitioner is informed, the doctrine thus stated has never been directly presented by American seamen to any executive department of the Federal Government, although efforts have been made to obtain Executive action in prevention of the employment of Chinese persons as seamen on board American ships—Chinese persons, that is, not entitled to enter American territory. The only delay an inquirer into the law is likely to encounter in reaching acceptance of this doctrine will be due, your petitioner believes, to possible misconception of the scope and value of three judicial decisions, namely: In re Moncan (14 Fed. Rep., p. 44), in re Ah Kee (22 Fed. Rep., p. 519), and in re Jam (101 Fed. Rep., p. 989). However, the American ship is American territory principle was not invoked and was not considered in any of these cases, and the controlling principle of each of them—all may come who are not expressly forbidden—has been repudiated by the later and higher authority of Lee Ah Yin v. The United States (116 Fed. Rep., p. 614), affirming the principle of United States v. Ah Fawn (57 Fed. Rep., p. 591)—none may come who are not expressly allowed.

III. PRAYER.

In consideration of the facts and the law as heretofore stated, the undersigned prays application of the law to the facts to the end that American seamen may be spared further injury by nonexecution of statutes to the protection whereof they believe themselves entitled in individual right and for national welfare.

It is urged upon your attention, moreover, that a construction of Chinese exclusion statutes placing Chinese seamen outside such statutes must lead to the conclusion that Chinese persons who are by their calling as seamen saved from the prohibitions of the exclusion policy, fall under the maritime law only, a conclusion involving—unless judge-made law be used—recognition of the right to quit work in our seaports and the right of unobstructed locomotion within American territory in the usual manner of seamen shifting from port to port and from overseas trade to coastwise, lake, or river trade.

Your petitioner can not believe, now that it brings to your notice the conditions as it sees them, that you will suffer any straining of the Chinese exclusion laws as against the rights of American seamen and the national interest as represented by them or by any unauthorized abridgment of the navigation laws.

Wherefore this prayer: That you direct the consular, immigration, and other executive officers of the United States to cooperate in enforcing the Chinese exclusion laws in the matter of seamen.

(Signed) By WM. H. FRAZIER, Secretary-Treasurer.
(Signed) EDWARD J. LIVERNASH, Counsel.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1904.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask permission to insert as part of my remarks a copy of resolutions passed by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of June 10, 1913.]

SEAMEN'S LAWS ARE CONDEMNED—LOCOMOTIVE BROTHERHOOD PASSES RESOLUTIONS AIMED AT MARITIME CONDITIONS.

Resolutions condemning the present inefficient seamen's laws were passed by the convention yesterday. The resolutions deplore the absence of Americans on the high seas, and declare that this fact alone is conclusive evidence that conditions are so far below the usual standards as to cause our men and boys to shun the calling. The resolutions passed yesterday are as follows:

"Whereas the absence of native Americans in our merchant marine is conclusive evidence that the living conditions of our seamen are so far below the usual standards as to cause our men and boys to shun the calling; and

"Whereas the increase in wrecks of vessels and the increase in the loss of lives prove that the standard of skill of the men employed is continually deteriorating and the danger of life at sea increasing; and

"Whereas the official investigation of wrecks all point to and demand some real and effective remedy; and

"Whereas congressional committees have had hearings during the sessions of Congress for the past 12 years, and there finally has passed the House a measure which has since had the unqualified approval of the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor: Therefore be it

"Resolved by this twenty-sixth convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, That we indorse Senate bill No. 4 and urge its adoption as recommended by the departments above referred to; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senate Committee on Commerce, the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the President of the United States, and to Senator LA FOLLETTE, the author of the bill in the Senate."

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask permission to insert as a part of what I have said, and as bearing on the provisions of the bill, a communication from Mr. Andrew Furuseth of June 16, 1913, and from the other angle a letter from the Detroit & Cleveland Navigation Co., together with a further communication from the Independent Vessel Owners of the Great Lakes. I ask to have these communications inserted as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 16, 1913.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having been given the opportunity to examine the brief and papers accompanying the same sent to the Committee on Commerce by a committee of shipowners, representing the Lake Carriers' Association, I deem it my duty to the seamen, to the members of the committee, and to the country to deal briefly with the matters contained in the brief.

The seamen's bill, so-called—the legislation upon this subject—has in the main three purposes:

First. To promote safety at sea.

Second. To give freedom to the seamen, to provide better conditions for the seamen, and by so doing inducing a better class of men to seek the sea.

(There can be no safety at sea except through the right kind men properly trained in their work.)

Third. To abolish the differential in favor of foreign vessels in the wage cost of operation when competing with domestic vessels in taking passengers and cargo from American ports.

The present condition automatically keeps the right kind of boys from seeking the sea, and drives the right kind of men from the occupation. Shipowners themselves acknowledge this by insisting in communications, which no doubt have come to you, as they have to other Senators, that they can not find officers or men fit to become officers in sufficient number to obey the provisions of the act providing for officering of vessels passed at the last Congress.

Senate bill 4, introduced by Senator LA FOLLETTE, substantially as it passed the House in the last Congress, will accomplish the purpose gradually and without any undue hardship upon the shipping interests. By making its provisions dealing with freedom, safety, and the shipping of men applicable to foreign vessels coming to our ports it would tend to automatically equalize the cost of operation and to abolish the present unfair competition with domestic vessels.

Sections 6, 14, and 15 will provide the freedom.

Section 3 provides the means through which it may be exercised.

Section 12 provides for the necessary training, the standard of efficiency, the knowledge of the language of the officers; that is, it deals with safety and makes the provisions applicable to foreign vessels visiting our ports.

Senate bill 136, which is dealt with in the memorial from the lake shipowners, deals with freedom in sections 8, 17, 18, 19, and 20, but the means through which it may be exercised is denied by the proviso of five days, which exempts the lake vessels, and the proviso which deals with vessels owned in major part by American citizens or corporations and excludes from the operation of the bill vessels that are purely foreign. It deals with safety in sections 14 and 15, but in such a way as to permit vessels to continue to carry the kind of men now carried.

The present crews are condemned by experience, by commissions, and by the courts, and the exceptions, beginning on line 13, page 18, by the word "unless" and ending on the same page, on line 22, by the word "lifeboat," give statutory sanction to crews held inefficient by the courts.

Section 15, which the brief from the Lakes seek to have amended, provides that none but able seamen shall be at the wheel or lookout, that they shall stand in three watches, and this shall be applicable to foreign as well as to domestic vessels. To regulate the number and skill of men which foreign vessels must have before they can be cleared from the ports of the United States is simply following the precedent set by England. To regulate their employment while at sea and beyond the jurisdiction of the United States would seem to be a question of propriety, if not of power. This phase of section 15 is, however, not dealt with in the brief from the Lakes. They simply seek to have the lake vessels exempted. They submit the amendment in three forms. In the first form all vessels not carrying passengers are exempted from the three-watch system. In the second form it provides for the three continuous hours at the wheel. (The British commission found that more than two hours would be too long.) The third proposed form accomplishes the same purpose in a different way, but in either case it would exempt the larger number of vessels on the Great Lakes, and with the exemption made to the regulations of the hours of labor, found in section 2, it would leave the lake situation as it now is, with this exception, that they would be compelled to carry four skilled men regardless of the vessel's tonnage if she be more than 300 tons gross. There would be no improvement in the personnel, the better class of men for sea, recommended by the committee on the Titanic and adopted by the Senate, would not be accomplished. The development of seamen from whom officers could be made would not take place.

In conclusion I beg to state that Senate bill 4 is the House bill; it is not the seamen's bill. It is the House committee's compromise between the contention of the seamen and the contention of the shipowners, and the House committee cut from the seamen's bill all that was possible to cut and yet accomplish the purpose intended, leaving several years of development to reach a condition of efficiency necessary to safety.

The House bill provides a percentage of able seamen in all vessels above 100 tons; it thus leaves opportunity for training of seamen, while it falls with equal weight upon all vessels regardless of their size.

Senate bill 136 provides a specific number of able seamen for any vessels above 300 tons; thus while it discriminates against the smaller vessels in favor of the larger ones it does not give that opportunity for training which is provided in Senate bill 4.

The proposed lake amendment of section 15 of Senate bill 136 would sacrifice safety to profit, because it takes two vessels to go into or to avoid a collision. The skill needed in both vessels is equal.

Senate bill 4 provides for at least two watches on deck, leaving three watches, when needed, to be reached later, either by mutual agreement or through legislation.

Respectfully, yours,
ANDREW FURSETH,
President International Seamen's Union of America.

DETROIT, June 11, 1913.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This company desires to make a protest against the three-watch plan now advocated by the union. You probably know that our steamers leave Detroit daily at 10.45 p. m., arrive Cleveland 6 a. m. the next morning. Our steamers for Buffalo leave Detroit at 5 p. m. daily, arrive at Buffalo next morning in time for connection for all eastbound trains, and the crew operating seven hours have all day to sleep.

We also have a boat operating during the daytime between Cleveland and Put-in-Bay, Ohio, also between Toledo and Put-in-Bay, running time is about four hours each way, laying up at night.

We also have a daylight boat, every other day, between Detroit and Cleveland, running time seven hours, lay-over all night.

We could not possibly put on a three-hour watch on these lines and pay a dividend to our stockholders.

I think the three-hour watch at sea, where they have a continuous run, is perfectly proper, but for the Great Lakes they should be excepted in this bill, and we hope you will do everything you can in our behalf.

Respectfully,
DETROIT & CLEVELAND NAVIGATION CO.,
M. SCHANZ, Vice President and General Manager.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1913.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Supplementing the several statements submitted to-day for your respectful consideration, giving the comparative time in port and at sea of nine different representative fleets engaged in commerce on the Great Lakes, we attach hereto a summarized statement showing a general average of 42.68 per cent in port of total time of commission.

These figures verify the statement made last winter before the subcommittee on the Wilson bill that the boats on the Great Lakes were in port over 40 per cent of the time. Some of the official logs from which the record was compiled were left with Senator BURTON and are open to examination as a basis for verifying the statement.

The fleets selected, we firmly believe, truly represent the general average of time in port of bulk freights on the Lakes, as the statement includes fleets which have every facility for operating their boats with the least possible time in port. There are many independent boats entirely dependent on the open market for cargoes, not included in the list, having no affiliations whatever with shipping interests, and obliged to take freights as offered, regardless of conditions at loading and unloading ports. Such boats would show an average of about 50 per cent in port.

We sincerely hope that the additional statistics supplied will prove conclusively that there is no occasion for legislation requiring three shifts of wheelmen and lookouts, who are really engaged in their regular duties slightly more than one-half of the time and the remainder of the time in port when the work is merely nominal.

Of all the men employed on the ships of the Great Lakes the men under discussion have the least arduous employment and are satisfied with the conditions now existing.

All the foregoing matter has reference to section 15, page 21, Nelson bill. Respectfully, yours,

INDEPENDENT VESSEL OWNERS OF THE GREAT LAKES, By CHARLES O. JENKINS.

STATEMENT SHOWING NUMBER OF HOURS WHEELSMEN AND LOOKOUTS ARE EMPLOYED ON DUTY WHILE THE VESSEL IS IN PORT WAITING FOR HER DOCK TO DISCHARGE CARGO.

The wheelmen working 6 hours per day, or 6 hours out of 24, say the vessel comes into port at 8 o'clock in the morning, the wheelman who is on watch when the vessel comes into port goes below at 12.30 p. m. and sleeps until 6 p. m.

The wheelman below in the forenoon comes on watch at 12.30 p. m. and remains on duty until 6 p. m., and then both wheelmen go below until 6 o'clock the following morning, then only one wheelman goes on duty—the one who has the first watch—and the wheelman on the after watch goes back to bed or uptown just as he pleases. This is when the vessel is not loading or unloading cargo.

The watchmen working watch and watch 6 hours on deck and 6 hours below. But each of the watchmen work 6 hours, as we only have 12 hours' daylight, so it can be readily seen that each man only works 6 hours each day. The watchman during the night goes about the ship seeing that everything is safe on board, looking after lights and seeing that the vessel's moorings are secured and that no strangers come aboard.

When the vessel is discharging or taking on cargo the wheelmen and watchmen are then standing watch and watch, 6 hours on duty and 6 hours below. Their duty being then to look after the mooring cables of the vessel, to see that they are kept tight and the vessel is kept close to the dock. The wheelman looking after the forward cables and mooring engine and the watchman the after cables and mooring engine.

The labor performed by these men is not hard or laborious work, and they have their regular watch and watch at all times. And we may also state that the deck hands also work watch and watch, 6 hours on deck and 6 hours below. Three deck hands are on deck on each watch. This work is carried out during the entire season on all boats.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator from Wisconsin is willing, it seems to me it would be advisable to have printed the proposed substitute which he offered this morning, and the comparison of the two which I believe he also offered and asked to have printed. I think, then, it would be advisable to lay the bill over until that printed matter is on our desks and until the Senate meets again.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, nor to the adjournment until Saturday. I should like to be heard now, however, very briefly.

I consider very inopportune the probable disposition of the bill at this time. In the first place, there is a small attendance of the Senate here, as is illustrated right now. We were called together to consider certain other subjects and are fagged out by our labors. The bill is an exceedingly important one, and should receive the most careful attention of the committee, in the first place, and of the Senate when there is a full attendance here.

I will yield to no one in realization of the importance of the propositions involved. It has been most unsatisfactory to members of the committee because the seamen, on the one side, and the vessel owners, on the other side, have been so far apart, taking widely divergent views of these questions, and it is impossible for any committee to satisfy either of them.

Again, in our discussions last winter too much attention was paid to the relation between the employer and the employee and their respective interests and not enough to the general question of safety. Indeed, that fact has run through all these bills and all these discussions. The seamen come in on the one side, and the vessel owners on the other, and state their respective views, while in the meantime precautions for the safety of life are likely to be neglected. That is to say, safety appliances, hours of labor, and number of men are considered not from a broad general standpoint, but from the standpoint of either employer or employee. So I have no confidence that at this season, when the Senate has disposed of one very important bill and is marking time for taking up another, this bill will receive the consideration it deserves.

There is another reason, however, which affects my judgment more nearly than that. In June, 1912, the Congress passed a resolution inviting all maritime nations to join in a conference on the subject of safety at sea. In that movement we took the initiative. The resolution was introduced almost immediately after the Titanic disaster and when we were in the shadow of that frightful calamity. There was a great deal of delay and inertia, such as characterize diplomatic proceedings, but by mid-summer of this year the invitation was generally accepted. A conference has been called at London for the 12th of next month. In pursuance of our invitation propositions have been already formulated for consideration at that time. The President had chosen some 11 or 12 delegates to attend the conference; and on the very day when, as I understand, in the presence of only eight Senators, there was a unanimous-consent agreement that this bill should be taken up, the members of that delegation met.

We are thus assuming the position that after we have invited the conference, after other nations have accepted our invitation, after the time has been fixed, and after the propositions have been formulated and delegates chosen, we are seeking to prejudice the very questions which are to be considered at the conference on the 12th of next month. We say: "We asked you to meet in conference; we initiated the proceeding, but now we will go ahead and legislate on matters which pertain not merely to domestic shipping but to foreign shipping as well before the conference is held which we invited."

It seems to me we are placing ourselves in a most inconsistent position in taking that attitude. This bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce with the express statement that action ought not to be taken until the regular session, when the results of the conference should be before us. Again, many of these questions are international. We can not settle them satisfactorily by this bill. We can impose regulations on ships that sail out from our ports, and we should impose them where they make for safety of life. Every time there is a disaster some one who has an interest to serve says it was because the legislation he advocated was not adopted. Those subjects, however, require very careful consideration and expert examination, so that they may be determined, not according to the agitation of the moment, but according to scientific principles and after careful review of the facts.

Mr. President, I think the great maritime danger of the future is from fire. We can provide lifeboats; we can provide men to handle them; we ought to provide, and it ought to be made a part of this legislation, that there should be regular lifeboat drills. For some reason which I can not understand, seamen and owners alike have opposed inserting in the bill a provision that there shall be regular lifeboat drills. The bill ought not to go to the President without compulsory drills. I have seen them on ocean steamers sometimes when I was very much impressed with their inefficiency. I should hardly have wished to trust my life, or the life of anyone, in the hands of those who were lowering those boats and pulling them up again with so little practice as they displayed. But certainly you will not find in bill No. 4, as I recall, and I think not in bill No. 136, any provision for practice in handling lifeboats, which constitutes the very first essential for safety at sea.

As regards fire, that is a question that must be settled largely by international agreement. I should be very slow to give my opinion as to the cause of the late Volturno disaster, but I should not be surprised if it should develop that if our laws had been enforced in loading the cargo of that ship no such disaster would have occurred. We are in advance of other maritime nations in section 4472 and the following sections of the Revised Statutes, I believe it is, in specifying the kind of cargo that may be carried on a passenger steamer. Penalties are imposed on shippers and carriers alike if they send or carry certain combustible articles at sea.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will pardon me, I will yield to him in just a moment.

The foreign regulations are by no means so strict. Our regulations apply not only to our domestic shipping, but to foreign steamships carrying cargoes out of this country; but they do not, of course, apply to shipments made, say, from Holland or England or any other foreign country or port to this country.

When this conference meets, one of the main things it ought to take up is the carrying of combustible or inflammable material in cargoes. That is a matter which can and should be reached by a general agreement or convention.

Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Ohio was speaking of the origin of the fire on the Volturno. He has evidently given some thought to the matter. A dispatch was published in some of the papers a short time ago, purporting to be from an officer of the company which owned that ship, to the effect that he had received a letter threatening the destruction of the vessel by burning. Has the Senator paid any attention to that matter? Has he any information on the subject?

Mr. BURTON. I have.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to hear it.

Mr. BURTON. There was a statement last night from Capt. Tinsley, the manager of the line, to the effect that the report was a canard; that he had received no such note. That illustrates the thick-coming rumors that always prevail after a great disaster of this kind. The dispatch contradicting this rumor may have lacked authenticity, but I saw such a statement saying that he had contradicted it.

One other thing—and I think I can say this with honest pride in the superiority of our regulations. We are in advance of other nations in many provisions for life-saving apparatus. Our boats are compelled to be provided with a line-carrying gun which will shoot a rope on another boat some little distance away. Here, again, I do not wish to express any opinion; it is too early; but there are some indications that such an appliance would have been very useful when one of the boats of the rescuing fleet came very near the stern of the Volturno.

Mr. President, I do not want to see this bill taken up and considered when the arguments pro and con proceed so largely from these conflicting interests to which I have referred. We take a broader view of the matter. We must examine the subject more elaborately, and I do not think we ought to enact legislation this coming week, when some of the best experts of the world will come together next month to consider these questions.

There is one thing in this bill, and it is in all pending bills, that I think every Member of the Senate would insist upon, the abolition of arrest for desertion, whether the seamen be domestic or foreign. It is altogether contrary to the spirit of our institutions to restrain a man's liberty by arresting him and placing him again on a boat or elsewhere in the performance of a task which he has chosen to leave. But all these things ought to be done with a due regard for diplomatic courtesy, with proper respect for existing treaties, and in such a way as to cause no irritation or jolt in our relations with foreign powers.

I do not anticipate that the American delegates would altogether agree with the foreign delegates on some questions. It would be my conjecture that they would go considerably further in their requirements for safety in the manning of boats; but let us at least give them a chance to state their side of the case in a conference that we ourselves have called.

Mr. President, I have already—

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator sits down I wish to ask him a question. The Senator made a rather striking statement that caught my attention. He was speaking of the necessity of drills in the handling of lifeboats, and remarked that, strange to say—and I agree in that thought of his, for to me it is a strange thing—the owners of ships, as well as the seamen in charge of them, are opposed to drills of that kind. Now, why is that? It would seem to me that the contrary should be the rule.

Mr. BURTON. I could not say that all of them oppose drills, but objections were presented to us. One reason, no doubt, is the time lost. For instance, if a trans-Atlantic liner lowers a boat in midocean it would cause a delay, estimated by one of our officers—I think he makes the estimate too large—of from two to five hours, due to the slackening of speed, the stopping, and the actual time employed in boat drill. Sometimes, also, the drill is rather dangerous.

That is one source of objection from the owners or managers. Then another is made by the seamen. The question is very much discussed whether a drill in port is useful or not. The relation between the master and the seaman is in a measure suspended then; many of the sailors go ashore. This bill, I think, very properly limits the hours in which seamen may be employed. Both bills agree on that. The seamen do not like to engage in drills when they are in port.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

Mr. BURTON. I should perhaps modify my statement by saying that not all object to these drills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he thinks the first reason given is a good one.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. The lowering of boats ought to be tried, too, when they are out in somewhat squally weather, for a disaster is more likely to occur then than when they are in a calm.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not care at this time to make answer to the criticism involved in the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] as to the making of this bill a special order by unanimous consent; but when the bill comes up for debate I shall revert to that matter, and at the same time I shall take occasion to say something on the advisability of our proceeding with this legislation at this time without regard to the proposed international convention.

I trust, Mr. President, that when we come to the consideration of this bill at the next meeting of the Senate it will be with a somewhat better attendance than we have now. I believe the Senate will take as great interest in this as in any other subject of legislation considered at this session. When we have the bill, with the proposed substitute, on Senators' desks, so that the different provisions can be compared, I believe I will then be able to make full answer to the criticism which has been made here of Senate bill No. 4, a bill which I had the honor to introduce.

While on my feet I desire to say for the Record that in the Sixty-second Congress the House of Representatives passed a bill dealing with this subject. It was a bill that had been introduced and reintroduced in both Houses of Congress for several years. It was the result of years of careful investigation of the subject. In that study the Congress had the benefit of expert knowledge of the highest type.

I think, Mr. President, if that measure can have fair consideration by the Senate it will be accepted as a comprehensive and a very wise piece of legislation. That bill passed the House of Representatives with only 4 dissenting votes. It came over to the Senate. It came early in the session. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and there encountered just what this legislation has met for 20 years—the opposition of the great steamship companies. That opposition was strong enough to delay, and delay, and delay the consideration of the bill in that committee all through that session. As the close of that session drew on I, from this place, appealed to the chairman of that committee again and again to know if we could not have a report upon the bill during that session. But it went over. It went over with the promise of the chairman that he would call the committee together during the recess in order that they might be ready to report the bill back at the beginning of the next, the short, session that closed the last Congress.

But, Mr. President, when that bill did get back into the Senate and could be brought before this body it was, as I recall, within 12 hours of the life of that Congress. If I remember rightly, it was taken up on Sunday afternoon while we were in a session that had continued from Saturday. The bill reported was not the bill that had passed the House. The committee reported a bill which has been reintroduced in this session by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. No; not by the Senator from Ohio; by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. By the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator from Ohio has introduced another bill, which, so far as the public interest and the urgent necessities of this situation are concerned, is, I believe, more unsatisfactory than the bill reported out by the committee. But they reported out a bill, and we had to take up its consideration in the closing hours of that session, and, of course, it could get no consideration worthy of the great subject. It was the House bill, with the best provisions cut out of it. And that is what this bill is which has come back here again from that committee.

Now, I am not going to take time and go into and make an analysis of it now, but I will before this debate is concluded. It is only necessary to examine the amendments made by the Senate committee of the last Congress to see where they came from and what interest they serve. It is the interest that for 20 years has prevented legislation for the emancipation of the seamen from slavery or for the protection of the public traveling at sea. It is the same sort of thing that we have had to wrestle with in dealing with the railroads. They resist legislation to compel the adoption of safety appliances; they resist the proper equipment of their trains. It is human nature, I suppose; but we have had to fight every inch of the ground with those transportation companies and we have had to make the same fight to provide reasonable safety at sea. We have made some progress. We came to a time when there was an opportunity to secure consideration of the legislation. I saw that opportunity. I have no apologies to make, no explanation to offer, no regrets to express for having secured unanimous consent for the consideration of this great measure at this time.

I am just going to make a little further answer to the question asked by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] while I think of it. At first view it must strike one as strange that anybody should object to the provision for lifeboat drill; but lifeboat drill was projected by the steamship owners, or by those who represented them before these committees, for the purpose of getting rid of the provision of the bill fixing the standard of efficiency tests in the employment of seamen. In other words, they wanted to be able to get any kind of men on their vessels. They were willing to educate them by means of lifeboat drills, but they were unwilling that there should be written into the law provisions which would require that the men should be skilled seamen before life and property were ever committed to their hands as sailors. That is the issue.

Furthermore, Mr. President, it is the contention of the sailors that neither in harbor nor on a voyage on one of these trans-Atlantic steamers can you get just exactly the sort of drill so vital to the saving of life in the time of terror.

Lifeboat experience, as I understand it from the little that I have studied of this subject, is to be acquired by men in a long series of years in serving in the management of boats. The men must have the knowledge which can only be acquired by long study of the sea. They must know the sea before they can know how to lower a lifeboat. In time of disaster, we will say, when it is necessary to lower a lifeboat, the sailor must know just when to lower that lifeboat within a few feet of the water, and then he must know just how the waves run, so as to seize the exact instant to let go and put the craft into the water.

Mr. President, I did not intend to go into this matter at all at this time. I have asked to have printed the bill that passed the House of Representatives a year and a half ago perhaps. It is a bill that had received the approval of committee after committee over there. I think it needs some slight modification. Shortly after it was introduced here it went to the Committee on Commerce, and at my request the chairman sent the bill to the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor. They made an examination of and reported upon it in a letter that discusses its provisions and in which they recommend its passage. They suggested two or three amendments. I have incorporated these in the reprint of it which I asked to have made and which will be upon the desks of Senators at the next session of the Senate. I also added another amendment providing definitely for a lifeboat equipment sufficient to furnish safety to all persons carried, crew and passengers. That bill will be printed in connection with this reported bill in different type so that Senators can readily run their eye over its provisions and note the difference between the proposed substitute and the reported bill.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will just permit me to say—

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is entirely satisfactory, because that will give opportunity to have this matter printed and give one day for its examination before the Senate takes it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to say just a further word in reference to section 14. I do not know that I made myself clearly understood in the questions which I submitted to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I make the suggestion in reference to it so that it may be considered by the committee.

The provision of section 14 first is:

That no vessel—

With certain exceptions—

shall depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel—

Thus far the provision is perfectly clear and perfectly simple and perfectly capable of enforcement. Everybody would understand it exactly alike. But it continues—

unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen—

Certainly if we stop there the test is not sufficient. What is a sufficient number of men? One man, as I have said, would think that a small number were sufficient and another that an entirely greater number were necessary. A statement of that kind in a law, and particularly in a penal law, is quite as indefinite as to say, "A large piece of chalk." If I should require that a large piece of chalk should be furnished, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] might regard a piece of chalk as large as my fist as a large piece of chalk, while another might think it a very small piece. It furnishes absolutely no standard. This is a penal law. The violation of it subjects the master of a ship to a fine, I think, of $500. A law of that kind ought to be couched in such definite terms as that everybody reading it can understand precisely what was meant and everybody reading it would understand it precisely alike.

Now, it continues:

The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that perhaps that might cure it, but it seems to me that it does not, because that fixes a minimum. If the number of seamen of this character is not equal to the number of lifeboats carried on the vessel, then conclusively it must be assumed negatively that there is not a sufficient number.

But it does not follow affirmatively that even if there was that number that it is sufficient; if there are not that many, the number is not sufficient; but confusion will arise from having put into the law these two tests: First, that there shall be a sufficient number; and, second, that it shall not be less than the number of lifeboats.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I very much hope, of course, that the Senate will dispose of that matter by rejecting it altogether and by adopting the provisions of Senate bill No. 4 with regard to the standard of efficiency and the standard it provides for equipment and crew of a vessel.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have been comparing these two sections, section 12 as proposed in the substitute with section 14, and while I am not an expert in maritime matters—I claim to know very little about such matters—section 12 is perfectly understandable. It is a clear and definite statement of what is required; there can be no doubt about it. As I am at present advised, I can see no reason why section 12 should not be substituted for section 14; and I shall await with some curiosity to hear what the proponents of section 14 have to say in favor of it as against the very clear provisions of section 12.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that instead of building upon S. 136, reconstructing it by amendment, the bill that the Senate will pass will be a well worked out, comprehensive piece of legislation, such as that which passed the House of Representatives over a year and a half ago. I hope the bill I introduced as S. 4 will be substituted for the reported bill. In that way we shall get a much better piece of legislation than we will if we attempt to patch up S. 136 to make it acceptable.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the pending bill, the unfinished business, may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Saturday, October 18, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 16, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the accumulated knowledge which has come down to us out of the past, for the hopes and promises of the future. Thou art an imminent God, ever working in and through Thy children for the higher and better forms of life. The last word has not been uttered, the last revelation has not been made. Make us therefore susceptible, that we may hear Thy voice, feel and know Thy presence, and go forward to new achievements for ourselves and for all the world; and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCOME-TAX LAW AS APPLIED TO INDIVIDUALS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing a synopsis of the provisions of the income-tax law as it applies to individuals. This synopsis has been prepared by my distinguished colleague Judge HULL. I myself have received many inquiries from constituents who want to know about these provisions, and no doubt other Members have received similar inquiries. I desire to have this printed so that we may avail ourselves of it in order to answer these inquiries correctly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the provisions of the income-tax law as applied to individuals.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether it would not be more convenient and proper to print it as a document?

Mr. SIMS. I want to do both. When this leave is granted, then I propose to ask to have it printed as a document.

Mr. HARDWICK. Regarding the latter part of the request, has the gentleman any idea what it will cost to print it as a document?

Mr. SIMS. No; I do not. I am asking first to print it in the RECORD. Then I will take up the other matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. I see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] here, and so I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this an argument or a statement which is proposed to be printed?

Mr. SIMS. It is merely a synopsis of the provisions of the income-tax law as applied to individuals.

Mr. MANN. A synopsis made by Judge HULL?

Mr. SIMS. By Judge HULL, who prepared the income-tax provision of the law.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I could not hear what reply the gentleman made when he was asked with reference to printing this as a document.

Mr. SIMS. I have asked to have it printed in the RECORD, because I do not think there will be any objection to that request. Then I expect to ask unanimous consent to have it printed as a House document. There may be objection to the latter request, but not to the first. That is the reason why I have submitted the request to print in the RECORD first.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing it in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Under the new income-tax law every citizen whose net income exceeds $3,000 will be required to pay a normal tax of 1 per cent upon such excess. However, for the year 1913 the tax will be measured by the net income accruing from March 1 to December 31. The taxpayer whose annual net income exceeds $3,000 for the year 1913 will therefore only be taxed on that portion of the same accruing from March 1 to December 31 in excess of $2,500 for an individual and $3,333.33 for married persons. The normal tax of 1 per cent applies from the lowest to the highest taxable income. Each taxable person will be furnished a blank return by the district collector or a deputy, which such taxpayer will be required to properly fill out and return to the office of the collector of the district in which he resides between January 1 and March 1, 1914. If any taxpayer should fail to receive such blank, he will be required, under penalty, to apply to the collector or a deputy for a blank return. Blanks will probably be on deposit with most postmasters for the convenience of the taxpayer.

"The Treasury regulations soon to be prepared will make clear to every taxpayer the requirements of the law and its application to income derived from the various kinds of business. To any person who keeps familiar with his business affairs during the year to the extent that at its end he knows with reasonable accuracy the amount of his aggregate annual profits, the matter of executing his tax return would be both simple and convenient.

"The statutory exemption of $3,000 is allowed for personal living or family expenses; however, this and other gross income for which special deductions are allowed by the law must be embraced in the return of gross income, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will make these deductions when he assesses and computes the tax. Each taxpayer will be notified of the amount of tax due by June 1, 1914, and will be required to make payment by June 30, 1914.

"The normal tax upon individuals is assessed and collected by either one or both of two methods, namely, personal return of the taxpayer and deduction and payment at the source of the income. For the year 1913 all such individual taxpayers will make a personal return of income for the purpose of the assessment and payment of the tax, except as to that portion of such income from which the tax is deducted and withheld at the source during the months of November and December, 1913. This latter method of assessing and collecting the tax only relates to fixed annual or periodical income exceeding $3,000 per annum, such as fixed annual or periodical interest, salaries, rent, royalties, partnership profits, and so forth. Under the provisions of the law this method requiring tax to be withheld at the source does not take effect until November 1. The tax withheld upon any amount of taxable income during November or December will only be 1 per cent of such income exceeding $3,000. This method of withholding the tax upon income in excess of $3,000 contains one exception, which relates to interest on corporate bonds and other like indebtedness, but it does not embrace interest paid by banks to depositors or interest upon notes or like obligations unsecured by mortgage or deed of trust. The 1 per cent tax upon such interest accruing to all individual bondholders will be withheld by the debtor corporation or its paying agent and paid to the Government, even though an individual's income is under $3,000.

"If the income of a person is under $3,000, or if the tax upon same is withheld for payment at the source, or if the same is paid or to be paid elsewhere in the United States, such person may make affidavit to such fact, and thereupon no return will be required. However, this does not mean that all people will thus have to make affidavit; only those whom the collector or his deputy upon reasonable grounds might believe were subject to tax would make affidavit.

"Below is given a synopsis of the new law as it relates to the taxation of individuals. The corporation-tax provisions are not synopsized, for the reason that they are substantially a continuation of the present corporation excise tax laws.

"INCOME TAX—PERSONAL. "INCOMES COVERED.

"Those of all citizens of the United States residing at home or abroad.

"Those of all persons residing in the United States, although not citizens thereof.

"All net incomes from property owned and from every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons (aliens or citizens) residing elsewhere.

"NORMAL TAX.

"One per cent per annum upon the amount of net income over $3,000 for individuals and over $4,000 for husband and wife living together.

"ADDITIONAL TAX.

"One per cent per annum upon the total amount of net income from all sources over $20,000 and not over $50,000 per annum.

"Two per cent per annum upon the amount of net income over $50,000 and not over $75,000.

"Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $75,000 and does not exceed $100,000.

"Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $250,000.

"Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000.

"Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000.

"For the purpose of the additional tax the total net income shall comprise that embraced in personal return, that on which tax is withheld at the source—dividends from corporations, and also undivided profits of corporations in the nature of mere holding companies or those formed to evade the tax.

"NET INCOME INCLUDES

"All gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services of any kind and however paid.

"Professions or vocations.

"Business, trade, or commerce.

"Sales or dealings in property, real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in property, real or personal.

"Interest, rent, dividends, and securities.

"Transactions of any lawful business carried on for gain or profit.

"Gains or profits or income derived from any source whatever.

"Income, but not the value, of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent.

"Neither the return of any part of principal invested in life insurance to the insured, nor proceeds of policies paid upon the death of the insured are included as income.

"DEDUCTIONS ALLOWED.

"Necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on any business.

"All interest, accrued and payable within the year on indebtedness.

"All national, State, county, school, and municipal taxes.

"Losses actually sustained during the year in the business from which income is derived, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, arising from fire, storm, or shipwreck.

"Debts actually ascertained to be worthless and charged off during the year.

"A reasonable allowance for the exhaustion or wear and tear of property arising out of its use or employment in business, not to exceed in the case of mines 5 per cent of the gross value at the mine of the output for the year.

"All income the tax upon which has been paid at the source.

"Amounts received as dividends upon the stock of any corporation, etc., which is taxed upon its net income, but such dividends shall not be deductible unless first reported in return as part of gross income.

"DEDUCTIONS NOT ALLOWED.

"All personal, living, or family expenses.

"Taxes assessed against local benefits.

"All expense of restoring property or making good the exhaustion thereof for which an allowance has been made.

"Amounts paid for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate.

"EXEMPTIONS.

"Interest upon the obligations of a State or any political subdivision thereof.

"Interest upon the obligations of the United States or its possessions.

"The compensation of the present President during the term for which he has been elected.

"The compensation of the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States now in office.

"The compensation of all officers and employees of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, but not including Senators and Representatives in Congress.

"AMOUNT OF INCOME EXEMPT.

"Three thousand dollars shall be deducted from the net annual income, as above ascertained, of each person, and $4,000 for husband and wife living together.

"TIME OF GOING INTO EFFECT.

"The tax shall be computed upon the remainder of the said net income for the year ending December 31, and for each calendar year thereafter, except that the tax for the year 1913 shall be computed only on that portion of income accruing from March 1 to December 31.

"RETURN OF INCOME.

"A true and accurate return of all net incomes of $3,000 or more for the year shall be made under oath or affirmation.

"It must be made to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which said person resides or has his principal place of business in the United States. A personal return of all net income shall be made for the purpose of the additional tax.

"FORM OF RETURN.

"The form shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Shall set forth specifically the gross amount of income from all separate sources. From this total shall be deducted the aggregate items of expenses and allowances above authorized.

"TIME OF RETURN.

"The return must be made on or before March 1, 1914, and on or before March 1 of each year thereafter.

"PERSONS REQUIRED TO MAKE RETURNS.

"1. Each taxable person of lawful age for himself.

"2. Guardians (legal or natural), trustees, and executors shall make and render a return of the net income coming into their custody or control of the person for whom they act.

"3. All persons, firms, companies, copartnerships, corporations, etc., having the control, receipt, disposal, or payment of fixed or determinable annual or periodical gains, profits, or income of another person subject to tax arising from an annual or periodical business relationship shall in behalf of such other person render a separate and distinct return for each person upon which the normal tax is paid at the source, but no tax shall be thus withheld until on and after November 1, 1913, and personal returns are required as to all income on which the tax is not thus withheld at the source.

"Persons conducting business in partnership shall be liable for tax only in individual capacity and upon each of such individual's share of the partnership profits, whether divided or not.

"EXCEPTIONS TO RETURNS.

"No return of income not exceeding $3,000 is required.

"Persons liable for the normal tax only on their own or another's account shall not be required to make returns of the income derived from dividends on capital stock of corporations taxable upon their net incomes.

"DUTY OF THE COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

"The collector or deputy shall require each list to be verified by oath or affirmation of the party rendering it.

"The collector may increase the amount of any return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated.

"No such increase shall be made except after due notice to such party and upon proof of the amount understated.

"In case of disagreement between the collector and the taxable person such person may submit the case, with papers and proof, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

"ASSESSMENTS.

"All persons shall be notified of the amount for which they are respectively liable on or before June 1 of each year.

"NEGLECTED, FRAUDULENT, OR FALSE RETURNS.

"In case of neglect or refusal to make returns, or in case of fraudulent or false returns, upon the discovery within three years after said return is due the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make such return himself.

"TIME OF PAYMENT.

"Said regular assessments shall be paid on or before the 30th day of June each year.

"Assessments made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are payable upon notification.

"PENALTY FOR DELAYED PAYMENTS.

"On sums due and unpaid after June 30, and after 10 days' notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be added 5 per cent to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month from the time the same became due.

"EXCEPTIONS AS TO PENALTY.

"Incomes from the estates of insane, deceased, or insolvent persons.

"COLLECTION AT THE SOURCE.

"All persons, firms, companies, etc., including lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees acting in any trust capacity, executors, etc., employers, and all officers and employees of the United States having control, receipt, custody, disposal, or payment of interest, rent, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensation, remuneration, emoluments, or other fixed or determinable annual or periodical gains, profits, and income of another person exceeding $3,000 for any taxable year who are required to make and render a return in behalf of another, are hereby authorized and required to deduct and withhold such normal tax and pay it to the United States official authorized to receive the same.

"EXCEPTION.

"Incomes from the dividends on the capital stock or from net earnings of a corporation, etc., subject to the normal tax, are not to be included in the above.

"LIABILITY AS TO TAX WITHHELD AT SOURCE.

"Each of the persons, firms, etc., above enumerated are hereby made personally liable for such tax.

"BENEFIT OF EXEMPTION.

"Where the income tax of a person is paid at the source, the benefit of the $3,000 exemption shall not be allowed unless there shall be filed, not less than 30 days prior to the day on which the return is due, with the person or concern required to make such payment of tax at the source, a notice in writing claiming the benefit of such exemption.

"When a taxable person's tax is paid at the source, if he desires any deduction for losses, expense of business, etc., he may file claim, together with return of any other income upon which the tax is not withheld at the source, either with the collector or with the person or corporation withholding his tax, as the taxpayer may choose.

"INDIVIDUAL INCOMES NOT EXCEEDING $3,000 PER ANNUM TO BE TAXED AT THE SOURCE.

"Incomes derived from interest on bonds, mortgages, or other indebtedness of corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, insurance companies.

"Incomes composed of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange for or in part payment of interest or dividends upon stock or obligations of foreign corporations, etc., engaged in business in foreign countries.

"Interest upon bonds of foreign countries.

"Foreign mortgages or like obligations not payable in the United States.

"GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"No taxable person shall be released from liability for this tax.

"When a return is made and his tax paid at the source, no person shall be required to make a return himself unless he has other net income.

"Only one deduction of the $3,000 shall be made in case of any person.

"FAILURE OR NEGLECT TO MAKE RETURN FOR PERSONAL TAX.

"Any person, corporation, etc., liable to make a return for a personal tax refusing or neglecting to make such return shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $1,000."

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the same be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that it be printed as a House document. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the mere request to print it as a House document of course will not do any good, unless a number of copies are printed.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The "usual number" would not go around in the House.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman what is the usual number?

Mr. MANN. I believe the usual number for the House is 420.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman suggest what he thinks would be a reasonable supply?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the document the gentleman desires to print is a valuable one for Members of the House, and in order to get the full benefit of it, it will be necessary to offer a concurrent resolution. You can not print over $500 worth as a House document. I suggest to the gentleman that instead of making the request now he ascertain from the Printing Committee how much it will cost and the number needed, and offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent to pass the resolution to-morrow. That will fully cover the subject.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. If the matter is printed in the RECORD, so that it will appear to-morrow morning, the gentleman may ascertain from the Government Printing Office how many copies can be printed within the limit of $500 and give that information to the House to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will do that.

THE LATE JOHN F. LACEY.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD relative to the services of the late Hon. John F. Lacey, who served as a distinguished Member of this body for 14 years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KIRKPATRICK] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONGRESS HALL CELEBRATION.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, as I did on last Friday, that the Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of House joint resolution 134, and that the same be passed. It provides for the appointment of a committee from the House and the Senate to attend the Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia on Saturday week, October 25. The attendance of that committee will be without expense to the Government. Our local committee provides entirely for that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am very glad, if the House is willing to do so, to pass the resolution by unanimous consent; but on yesterday I gave notice to Members that there would be no business transacted until further notice. I do not desire any resolution to come up that may precipitate a roll call on a legislative matter. I understand the gentleman's request is that the resolution may be passed by unanimous consent, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. That was not the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request was to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of House joint resolution 134 and for its immediate consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the resolution comes before the House if he intends to demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. MANN. I make no promise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I must keep my pledge to absent Members that business will not be transacted and that they will not be embarrassed by a roll call. I shall therefore be compelled to object.

Mr. VARE. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not object, and in order that there may be no question about it I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as passed on the offer made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to any such irregular procedure. I have no objection to the resolution being considered by the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Illinois expect to demand a roll call on this resolution?

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the House will do about that. I have not it in my power to call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not object, Mr. Speaker, but I will move to adjourn the House immediately if there is a demand for a roll call.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of this resolution and that it be now considered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kansas will withhold, I hope the gentleman is not going to object on account of the committee. Those of us on this side have no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was going to inquire whether the proponents of this resolution had ever asked the Committee on Rules for a hearing on the resolution, or asked that the resolution be reported?

Mr. LOGUE. They have not had time, and when I consulted the committee they advised me to ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does it not appear to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be a little irregular to offer a resolution and immediately ask that the committee be discharged without having asked the committee to consider it?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is nothing like that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did apply to the acting chairman of the Committee on Rules for a hearing.

Mr. MANN. Why did not the committee give him a hearing?

Mr. HARDWICK. Because we did not have a quorum in town.

Mr. MANN. The committee ought to have a quorum in town. Of all committees the Committee on Rules ought to have a quorum in town at all times.

Mr. HARDWICK. We looked into the matter and found that it involved no expense to the Federal Government; that it looked like a proper thing to do, and therefore we suggested that he bring it up in this way, so that any Member of the House, if he wished to, could object to it. There is no intention of reflecting on the committee in any way in this matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appreciate the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, but I have not had an opportunity even to read the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us have it read now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The resolution never having been called to the attention of the committee, it seems to be asking a good deal of the committee and of the House to pass the resolution without giving it any consideration whatever.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose I reserve the right to object and let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913.

Whereas Congress Hall, Philadelphia, has been recently restored to the condition in which it existed when used by the Continental Congress and the Congress of the United States at Philadelphia; and Whereas the citizens of Philadelphia have arranged for a fitting celebration to be held upon the turning over of the building by the committee in charge of the work of restoration; and Whereas the city of Philadelphia has extended an invitation to the Congress of the United States to have a representation of the Senate and House at the ceremonies: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint 13 Members, 1 from each of the 13 original States, to represent the Senate, and that the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint from the membership of the House such number of Members as may be requested by the city of Philadelphia; and that the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House so appointed shall constitute a joint committee on behalf of the Congress of the United States to attend the above celebration: Provided, That the attendance of the committee shall entail no expense on the Government of the United States.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members of the House, I desire to say that the city of Philadelphia has expended, through the mayor and city councils, $60,000 for the restoration of Congress Hall. It is proposed to publicly celebrate the restoration of that historic building. The President of the United States has accepted an invitation to make an address upon that occasion. This resolution provides that there shall be a Member from each of the 13 original States, appointed from Senate, as well as some 56 Members of the House, representing the number which went to make up the American Congress that assembled in Philadelphia during President Washington's time in the old Congress Hall. I trust that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VARE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How many Members of the House did the gentleman say the resolution provided for?

Mr. VARE. My information is that the purpose of the committee is to have 56.

Mr. MANN. I notice the resolution provides that the Speaker shall appoint some such number as the city of Philadelphia shall designate.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VARE. Certainly.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the purpose is to reproduce upon this occasion the same number of Members of Congress as there were at the time that the Congress sat in the city of Philadelphia. We desire to have, if possible, 56 Members of the House, which number our research shows was the number in the House at the time the Congress sat there.

Mr. MANN. When is this to be?

Mr. LOGUE. On Saturday week.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that if 56 Members of the House went over to Philadelphia on Saturday week, we would have enough left to do business here?

Mr. LOGUE. As much to do business then as we will have for a few days, and I feel this, that there are some who may, by reason of illness or otherwise, be absent from the House, residents of Philadelphia, New Jersey, and New York, who may feel it desirable to be present there.

Mr. MANN. That will make a very good excuse for their being absent, which they have not now, though most of them are absent.

Mr. LOGUE. I do not think any will be there who will want to be excused on account of sickness.

Mr. ADAMSON. In case of a tight situation they might call the roll over there.

Mr. LOGUE. The Speaker will be there, and there will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. MANN. I am very anxious to get a quorum of the House here and to keep it here and do some business.

Mr. VARE. This is a very patriotic occasion.

Mr. MANN. No more patriotic than Congress attending to its business.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, knowing now for the first time the purpose of the resolution, I shall make no objection. I should have had no objection to its consideration in the committee, even though a quorum was not present, and to having it reported regularly to the House—that is, I should not have raised the question of a quorum in the committee. I shall make no objection now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the gentleman make the point of order before the Chair announced the result of the vote on the passage of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It has not yet been passed. The resolution has first to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the House agreed to the passage of the resolution, did it not?

The SPEAKER. It did not. The House agreed to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will not the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama has moved that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 41, answered "present" 12, not voting 263, as follows:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of Stockton and Mormon Channels, Cal., including the diversion canal, with a view to determining what, if anything, may or should be done by the United States, either alone or in conjunction with the city of Stockton and the State of California, or with either of them, in order to increase the capacity of said diversion canal from its upper end in Mormon Channel to the mouth of Calaveras River in the San Joaquin River, so that said canal shall carry the entire flood flow of Mormon Channel and thus prevent the deposit of material in the navigable portions of Stockton and Mormon Channels (H. Doc. No. 256); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on examination and survey of Etowah, Coosa, and Tallapoosa Rivers, Ga. and Ala., with a view to their improvement for navigation, including the Alabama River in connection therewith, and investigations necessary to determine whether storage reservoirs at the headwaters of said rivers can be utilized to advantage, and what portion of the cost of any such improvements, including reservoirs, should be borne by owners of water power and others (H. Doc. No. 253); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of St. Martins River in Worcester County, Md. (H. Doc. No. 254); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of St. Marks River, Fla., from the town of St. Marks to the Gulf of Mexico (H. Doc. No. 255); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6392) granting an increase of pension to Oliver T. Everhart, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 8897) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to homesteads; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8898) to establish a mining experiment station at Grants Pass, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8899) relating to entries on the public lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8900) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Corvallis, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8901) amending an act approved March 4, 1911, relating to homestead entries in the former Siletz Indian Reservation in Oregon; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8902) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Grants Pass, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8903) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Ashland, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8904) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at the mouth of the Siuslaw River, Ore.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8905) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Oregon City, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) providing for the publication of 25,000 copies of book containing illustrations of fruits; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 139) to relieve destitution among the native people of Alaska; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. ROGERS: Resolution (H. Res. 289) requesting of the Postmaster General of the United States certain information relative to the affairs of his department; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 288) requesting of the Secretary of the Treasury certain information relative to the affairs of his department; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 8906) to correct the military record of William Green Mhoon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 8907) granting a pension to Almon Shibley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8908) granting a pension to John Alexander; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8909) granting a pension to Frederick L. Gray; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8910) granting a pension to Albert W. Kelley; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8911) granting a pension to Hugh B. Paige; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8912) granting a pension to Frank Meyer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8913) granting a pension to Frederick Loose; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8914) granting a pension to Elizabeth Mulvaney; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8915) granting a pension to Frazier Ward; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8916) granting a pension to James Aitken; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8917) granting a pension to Peter C. Dear-dorff; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8918) granting an increase of pension to John H. Turpin, jr.; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8919) granting an increase of pension to James Baragar; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8920) granting an increase of pension to Lieunary Flatter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 17, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great spirit, Father Soul, never far from any of us, we would draw near to Thee in the spirit of Him who taught us when we pray to say, Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of E. M. Fowler, second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. BRUCKNER, for 10 days, on account of the serious illness of his son, Tammany Bruckner.

Mr. THOMAS, indefinitely.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following telegram:

OIL CITY, PA., October 16, 1913.

HON. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.:

By advice my physician, request that you ask House for leave of absence for me, account illness.

WILLIS J. HULINGS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?
There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 746. An act for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker;

S. 3296. An act to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office; and

S. 2374. An act providing for the care of the Confederate Stockade Cemetery, Johnstons Island, in Sandusky Bay.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2374. An act providing for the care of the Confederate Stockade Cemetery, Johnstons Island, in Sandusky Bay; to the Committee on Appropriations.

S. 746. An act for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 7898. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes.

CONGRESS HALL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the consideration of House joint resolution 134, which was the unfinished business when we adjourned yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of House joint resolution 134. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 134.

Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913.

Whereas Congress Hall, Philadelphia, has been recently restored to the condition in which it existed when used by the Continental Congress and the Congress of the United States at Philadelphia; and

Whereas the citizens of Philadelphia have arranged for a fitting celebration to be held upon the turning over of the building by the committee in charge of the work of restoration; and

Whereas the city of Philadelphia has extended an invitation to the Congress of the United States to have a representation of the Senate and House at the ceremonies: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint 13 Members, 1 from each of the 13 original States, to represent the Senate, and that the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint from the membership of the House such number of Members as may be requested by the city of Philadelphia; and that the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House so appointed shall constitute a joint committee on behalf of the Congress of the United States to attend the above celebration: Provided, That the attendance of the committee shall entail no expense on the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FURNISHING ADDITIONAL ROOMS IN THE HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] presents a resolution and asks for its present consideration. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 142.

Joint resolution to provide for furnishing the additional rooms in the House Office Building.

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to furnish the additional rooms in the House Office Building, authorized by the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1913, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER, IND.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of an uncontested bridge bill. It has not been reported from the committee for the reason that the committee is unable to procure a quorum in order to consider it, but it is favorably reported by the War Department, and I am sure that if I could secure a meeting of the committee it would be unanimously reported. It is the bill H. R. 8702, and I ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8702) to authorize the county of Miami, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Wabash River in Miami County, Ind.

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Miami, of the State of Indiana, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River at a point where Broadway Street of the city of Peru intersects with the right bank of said Wabash River and Broadway Street of the corporate town of South Peru, Ind., intersects with the left bank of said Wabash River, in the county of Miami, in the State of Indiana, in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, and the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Also the following report was read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 4, 1913.
[Second indorsement.]

Respectfully returned to the chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, United States House of Representatives.
The Chief of Engineers reports that House bill 8702, Sixty-third Congress, first session, to authorize the county of Miami, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Wabash River in Miami County, Ind., makes ample provision for the protection of navigation interests, and I know of no objection to its favorable consideration by Congress so far as those interests are concerned.

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Acting Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no amendment recommended, but I, of course, want to offer one. I have marked three lines in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The first thing is to get unanimous consent to consider it. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what makes this legislation so urgent?

Mr. ADAMSON. Is the author of the bill in the House?

Mr. BARNHART. If he is not, he is on the way over from his office; but as I am interested as a neighbor I might explain the need of present action.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will yield to the gentleman to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, this proposed bridge is at the site of one of the many that were swept out of the Wabash River at the time of the awful floods last spring. The commissioners of Miami County, in which Peru is located, have ordered the construction of a bridge on the former site, but in doing so they submitted the matter to the War Department and asked if there would be any objection to the plans, inasmuch as the Wabash River has been designated as a navigable stream. The War Department approved the plans. The bridge is located in the south part of the city of Peru and divides the city. South Peru is now cut off from the main part of the city. Much of the south part of the county is virtually cut off from convenient entrance to the county seat because of lack of this bridge, and, as I understand, there is not anything in the way of the commissioners proceeding except the authority of Congress, which is required by law. Therefore, there being no objection from the War Department, and all of Peru and Miami County being interested in having this bridge as soon as possible so that north and south may no longer be isolated by much of the county center being divided into two inaccessible parts, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. COOPER. I have no objection. I simply wanted to know the reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a little unnecessary language—

The SPEAKER. Is it in the bill or not?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is in the bill. I want to strike it out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have marked three lines there which I want struck out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, lines 11 and 12, page 1, by striking out after the word "of" in line 11 the remainder of said line and all of line 12.

The SPEAKER. Read the language to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "of" the following: "Section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, and the provisions of"—

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, was that in the bill when it was submitted to the engineers?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. Was not their approval of the bill based in part upon that provision?

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not tell you. I know that it has no business in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] they have the authority to approve or disapprove plans, and this requires the bridge to be constructed under the general bridge act, which contains all the guaranties.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] will remember the section of the river and harbor act referred to applies to rivers inside of States that do not require congressional action, and it has no reference to this at all. It is a mistake to put it in the original bill.

Mr. COOPER. It is rather strange the engineers omitted to mention that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I presume it did not come to their attention. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILL SLOUGH, MARSHFIELD, OREG.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 767) granting permission to the city of Marshfield, Oreg., to close Mill Slough, in said city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mill Slough, a tidal tributary of Coos Bay, lying within the limits of the city of Marshfield, State of Oregon, is hereby declared to be not a navigable waterway of the United States within the meaning of the laws enacted by Congress for the preservation and protection of such waterways, and the consent of Congress is hereby given to the filling in of said slough by the said city of Marshfield.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire if there has been a report made upon this bill and an investigation by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Chief of Engineers of the War Department reports favorably upon the measure.

Mr. FOSTER. But we have no report on this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I intended to reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking the same question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], but he got the floor before I could secure recognition.

I wish to say that this bill came over some time ago, and one day when I was absent from the meeting of the committee the committee considered it and referred it to me for a report. I have not felt at liberty to report it, under the rule adopted by the caucus, but the Secretary of War has sent in a report, which is not only favorable but which urges action on the bill. Senator CHAMBERLAIN was very anxious that the bill be acted upon, and he urged it upon me. The Secretary of War wrote a second letter to me. I wrote him and asked him specifically why it was necessary to fill up this slough, when we were spending money to promote navigation everywhere else. He wrote at large, advocating that it be declared nonnavigable. On consulting the author of the bill and the gentleman from that part of the country who is on our committee [Mr. LAFFERTY] they assured us that the slough was a nuisance to the city and that it ought to be filled up. If it is not filled up, they will have to build a number of bridges over it, and they state that there is ample water front there without it, more than they can hope will ever be used. They urge the passage of the bill, and therefore I have offered no objection to it. Although it has not been reported by the committee, I have been authorized to report it if I want to; but the Speaker knows the reason I have not wanted to, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] knows it, too.

Mr. FOSTER. May I inquire of the gentleman from Oregon if it is proposed by the city of Marshfield to fill up this slough?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And it will not interfere with navigation in the future?

Mr. HAWLEY. The slough was once open, and somewhat navigable; but in the course of time a large amount of material has filled in, so that it is now navigable only for very small boats, and only a very few use it at high tide. It is an open sewer, a menace to the health of the city. The port commission proposes to spend $225,000 to dredge the bay in front of the city at its own expense, although this work ought to have been done by the Government of the United States. The people of Marshfield propose to do it at their own expense, and if they have to bulkhead along this narrow strip of water, it is going to cost the people a great deal of money. The passage of this bill is desired with practical unanimity by all the people.

Mr. FOSTER. And it has the approval of the engineers of the War Department?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; it has the approval of the engineers.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to say that when this bill was before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce it met with the unanimous approval of that committee, and we authorized the chairman to report the bill immediately; but owing to some caucus arrangement he did not feel at liberty to do so, as I understand it. I have gone into the merits of this bill, and I think it ought to be passed.

Mr. ADAMSON. My friend from Oregon tried to violate the Democratic caucus, and I would not allow that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question or two in reference to this project. I understand it is proposed to fill up this slough and to convert it into city lots. Now, who is going to own the city lots?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, it is proposed to permit the city to fill up the slough.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then do these lots become the property of the city?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not believe we ought to give away property to be filled up for the benefit of private landowners.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman from Oregon can tell.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the land is not already in private ownership it will be under the control of the United States, and it is not disposed of by this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But is the adjacent property privately owned?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. But I say if the land to be created by the filling in of the slough has not already passed from the hands of the Government into private ownership, then it will be in the United States Government after the passage of this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If it has passed into the hands of private owners, why do you come to Congress to get this permission?

Mr. HAWLEY. We have to come to Congress to get it declared unnavigable.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is not meeting the point. You are going to fill in a branch of the sea—a slough, as you call it. When you fill it in it brings it up to the level of the adjacent property.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It makes it available for town lots, does it not?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am assured by the chairman of the committee that in his judgment the bill is for the public good and ought to pass. Nevertheless, in bowing, as I always do, to his superior wisdom in such matters, I think the ownership of the property which is made valuable by this action ought to be definitely settled somehow in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The assurance that I gave to the distinguished gentleman from Texas is that this bill in no way affects or disposes of the title. The title will stand as it now stands.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the Government own the stream?

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not look into that; it is a little narrow ditch.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. Reserving the right to object, I could not hear the colloquy that took place between the gentlemen over there as to the title.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill will not affect the title at all; the title will remain the same as it is now.

Mr. GORMAN. Will it continue to be public property?

Mr. HAWLEY. That will depend on what the present status is. It will have the same status after the bill passes as it has now. It will not be affected at all by the passage of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. What is the present status of the title?

Mr. HAWLEY. My information is that a part of the land to be filled is in private ownership and a part may belong to the Government. Of that I am not sure. That is a question I have not gone into. This bill does not affect that question at all. If the title is now in the Government, it will be in the Government after the bill passes.

Mr. POU. As I understand, the filling in is to be done at the expense of the city.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and the people have created a port commission, which has control of the matter of dredging and improving the navigation on the bay.

Mr. POU. When these lots are filled in, the part of the slough now owned by private individuals will still be owned by private individuals?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; but they have contributed their proportion for filling it in by the payment of taxes.

Mr. POU. They have paid taxes like other people, but they have not contributed to the $200,000, the expense of filling it in, have they?

Mr. HAWLEY. The city is going to make a deep channel along the city front, and they need a place to deposit the material dug out, and if they get this land to put it on it will be a great saving and a great benefit. Otherwise they would have to carry it off much farther.

Mr. POU. Will not the result of the filling in of this place result in the fact that certain persons who own a part of the slough will derive considerable advantage from this filling in without paying for it?

Mr. HAWLEY. That will be for them and the city and the commission to settle. I think in some instances where the filling in is beyond a certain depth the commission has the power to ask the property owners to pay something; I think it is 6 cents per cubic foot for the filling in. There will be no injustice to anyone in that matter by the passage of this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has not deemed it necessary to go into the intricacies of the land titles, for the reason that the Federal Government is not interested in that matter. The local authorities there will deal with and settle all the questions that gentlemen have raised. The question submitted here is whether the United States will relinquish the right to make the slough navigable. If so, pass this bill. If not, let the bill not pass. The other questions are not involved here at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that in consideration of the Government's relinquishing the control over this stream or slough that it might say that the land created by it should go to the city or to the public schools of the city, or for some public service of that sort, instead of enriching the owners of the adjacent property?

Mr. ADAMSON. Neither the city, nor the county, nor the State has made any such request, and we did not consider it necessary to go into that at all.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of the bill is to permit the city to do this filling?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; the commission; but it goes a little beyond the city.

Mr. MANN. A municipality?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it before they did the filling, if there is any question about the title, they would make all proper arrangements?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and if there is any advantage to be derived that owners ought not to derive they will settle that.

Mr. MANN. How large a city is this?

Mr. HAWLEY. About 6,000 people.

Mr. COOPER. The principle of law as to a nonnavigable stream is that riparian owners own to the middle of the stream. The gentleman from Texas asked, if this bill passes, who would own the property made by filling in the slough? By the passing of this bill that stream or slough becomes at once nonnavigable, and the present riparian owners will then be riparian owners on a nonnavigable stream; and if the ordinary principle is to obtain, their ownership will go to the center of the stream.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of the Senate bill and to consider it now. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HEIRS OF DECEASED INDIANS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House the bill S. 3296, to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office, and to consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House, at the request of the gentleman from New York, the bill S. 3296, to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office, and the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to use not to exceed $10,000, for the employment of additional clerks in the Indian Office in connection with the work of determining the heirs of deceased Indians, out of the $50,000 appropriated in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for the purpose of determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees, pursuant to the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 855).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSERVATION OF FISH SUPPLIES.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bills H. R. 7774 and 7775, introduced by me, relating to the conservation of fish supplies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on certain bills relating to the conservation of fish supplies. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MONROE DOCTRINE AND MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes to discuss the Monroe doctrine and the Mexican question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on the Monroe doctrine and the Mexican situation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, what about Mexico, now in chronic chaos and anarchy? What about our proposed three-million-dollar permanent protectorate over Nicaragua. In order to protect the Panama Canal from competition? What about the Monroe doctrine, as applied to the military arrest of the House of Deputies of Mexico—the supreme elective legislative body—and the autocratic assumption of absolutism by the acting President? Usurper Huerta has assumed absolute dominion over Mexico, defying all constitutional checks. These are live questions, vital questions, momentous questions, that deeply concern every individual Member of this Congress and every patriotic citizen. I shall not discuss the proposed agreement with Nicaragua, only refer to it. The proposition to pay the unstable Republic of Nicaragua some $3,000,000 in order to exclude all other nations from building another interocean canal in competition with the Panama Canal does not appeal to me. We would part with over $8,000,000 for promises easily forgotten. As stated editorially in the New York World:

The present Government of Nicaragua is weak and desperate. Its people are unstable. Their promises and our three millions would probably run out together.

Stable government in Nicaragua is desirable and valuable to all who love peace and well-ordered law, but this is a far-away question compared with the Mexican question. Mexico is at our very doors. She is our nearest neighbor on the southwest. For nearly a thousand miles of river and territory she is adjacent to our border lines. The Mexican question is now the most vital question of the hour. It has reached a crisis that this Government, in justice to its past pretenses and traditions, can not afford to ignore. The humane policy of President Wilson in using moral suasion and soft-gloved diplomacy in the settlement of the Mexican question has not pacified Mexico, nor prevented the usurping President from assuming all the functions of government. He has enforced his official ukase to dissolve the congress by sending these supreme representatives of the people to prison by the bayonets of a servile army. This autocratic military rule, the joint product of treachery, conspiracy, and assassination, calls upon the Government of the United States for active intervention for the restoration of the Republic. And such action would not violate the spirit and purpose of the much-discussed Monroe doctrine. Let me quote a few vital sentences from the message of President Monroe in his seventh special message to Congress in December, 1823, now recognized as the Monroe doctrine:

The American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by European powers. We should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

What are the fundamental ideas of the Monroe doctrine?

First, we do not propose to interfere with the policies or politics of any European power; hence, we do not propose that they should extend their system—which refers to absolute monarchy—to any portion of this hemisphere.

In 1823 President Monroe proposed that any of these Central and South American provinces which had, through revolution, achieved their independence would be protected in maintaining that independence by all the moral and physical force of the United States. In maintaining that independence, so far as the principles of the Monroe doctrine are concerned, it makes no difference to any struggling Republic in Central or South America whether the usurper be a prince of the house of Bourbon in France or the usurper of constitutional liberty like Huerta. The principle is just the same. In other words, it makes no difference to the oppressed people of Mexico, who have lived under the free constitution for nearly half a century, whether the usurper be of royal blood or a half-bred mongrel, born on the soil. So far as the Monroe doctrine is concerned, we have practically demolished that by our own diplomacy. The vitality of the Monroe doctrine was that we would not interfere with any existing colonies or dependencies on this hemisphere and would not tolerate any interference by any European power with the new Spanish-American Republics, established by revolution.

With a hearty commendation of all that the President has done to promote constitutional government in Mexico, I hold that a crisis is now on that calls for immediate and effective action, without a resort to armed intervention by the United States alone.

Manifestly we can not extend recognition to the Huerta government. The action of Huerta in setting up a dictatorship removes him definitely beyond the pale. As I see it, one of three courses must be now adopted by the United States. We can raise the embargo which prevents the revolutionaries from obtaining arms and munitions of war from the United States, and thus encourage the Mexicans in their natural inclinations to kill each other. That would result in making a shambles of Mexico, and I do not believe President Wilson will ever consent to it. If we do not adopt this policy, we must either go to the extreme of armed intervention, involving all the cost in men and treasure of a long and difficult war, or we can, by cooperation with other powers, secure an early and, I believe, peaceful settlement.

Of these three possible courses I am heartily in favor of cooperation with other powers, even if this went to the extreme of a protectorate over Mexico. I do not believe it would go that far, however, for I am confident that if the powers get together and notify all factions in Mexico of their intention to see that a true constitutional government is set up in Mexico City no serious obstacles would be encountered in carrying out this program.

Let the United States ask the assistance of Great Britain, Germany, and France, as the three European powers having large interests in Mexico, and Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, the three great powers of South America.

This protectorate to be solely in the interest of peace and law and order until the electors of the Republic of Mexico can elect a President without military intimidation. When Mexico is again peaceful and law and order again prevail throughout the Republic the allied protectorate would be withdrawn. The claim made by some high officials in Washington that this humane scheme would be a violation of the Monroe doctrine has no validity whatever. No foreign power on either side of the Atlantic would in any event obtain either additional territory or dominion in Mexico. Owing to the marked hostility shown against the United States by both the federals and the constitutionalists, we would be involved in a costly and enduring war should this country alone assume an armed protectorate over Mexico. There is a feeling throughout Mexico that we would seek through war to annex Sonora, as our outlawry in violently seizing Panama, and our war against Spain which wrested Cuba and Porto Rico and 2,000 other islands in the Orient from Spain, has aroused grave suspicion among the Latin-American Republics of our fidelity to national pretenses in proclaiming a war for liberty, followed by continental land grabbing.

All the leading statesmen and scholars of both Brazil and Argentina repudiate the Monroe doctrine. They regard the doctrine of Monroe as the shield and buckler of United States aggression—as a sword suspended by a hair over the Latin-American Continent.

Consider these words of Prof. Gil, of the University of La Plata:

In its essence the Monroe doctrine is tutelage. No such policy of tutelage could be carried out without gravely offending the very strong national feeling of our people.

The entire press of the whole group of the Latin-American Republics repudiates the Monroe doctrine in toto. A book written by a young Peruvian student of sociology contains a chapter entitled, "The North American Peril." I quote a significant sentence from this book:

To save themselves from Yankee imperialism the American democracy of South America would almost accept a German alliance.

We shot the Monroe doctrine to death in our recent military diplomacy, the treaty of Paris, and the seizure of Panama.

What became of that vital section of the Monroe doctrine, as follows?—

With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere.

What became of that doctrine when, by the treaty of Paris, we wrested that vast aggregate of over 2,000 islands, known as the Philippine Islands, from Spain after Spain had held these islands for 329 years?

One of the basic principles of the Monroe doctrine is in the following sentence of President Monroe's message:

With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere.

How long had Spain controlled Cuba up to 1898? Almost 400 years. Did we have any cause for war with Spain, except to wrest Cuba from the boy King Alfonso and set her free? None whatever. And was not the upset and annihilation of Spanish rule in Cuba a complete abrogation and repudiation of the Monroe doctrine? No one can successfully deny it.

Before sailing to visit Latin America Col. Roosevelt was the guest of honor at a dinner given by the Progressive National Service at the "Jardin de Danse" on the roof of the New York Theater on Friday, October 3. Advance copies of his speech were sent out to the newspapers by different agencies—a 39-page oration, well conned and deliberate. In this speech, on page 12, is an enlightening reference to the manner in which Col. Roosevelt, then President, "took" Panama from its rightful owner, the Republic of Colombia, in violation of the treaty of 1846, by which the United States, as compensation for valuable consideration received, had solemnly guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada—now Colombia—possessed over the Isthmus of Panama.

Col. Roosevelt said:

I was finally faced by the alternative of seeing the building of the canal indefinitely postponed or else of having America, in the interest of the people of Panama, through whose territory the canal was to pass, in our interest, and in the interest of the nations of mankind, take hold and build it.

Here is an open confession of land piracy and national outlawry without even the pretense of legal justification.

Prof. Hiram Bingham, of Yale College, in his great little book just from the press of the Yale University, fittingly characterizes the seizure of Panama in the following language:

But one of the worst blows came in 1903, when we assisted in the establishment of the Republic of Panama and then took control of the Canal Zone. In other words, we went through the form of preventing a South American Republic from subduing a revolution in one of her distant Provinces and eventually took a strip of that Province and then took control of the Canal Zone.

Col. Watterson, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, in a recent double-leaded editorial criticizes our seizing of Panama, as follows:

The fly-by-night Republic of Panama, with William Nelson Cromwell working one end and Philippe Bunau-Varilla working the other—the Roosevelt administration holding whilst those two adventurers skinned Colombia—the gray wolves of the Senate looking on complacent—the 40 thieves of Paris and Washington to pocket the forty millions of swag—was bad enough. It wrote the blackest page in our diplomatic annals. But it was a bagatelle by the side of this undertaking, when we contemplate its full meaning, its reach, and consequences.

Once only have we ignored the Monroe doctrine in the interest of the highest patriotic instincts. Let me recall that era of courageous patriotism. I refer to 1849, when Daniel Webster was Secretary of State, when the Monroe doctrine was new. I remember the following year, in 1850, when a mere boy, I heard the great Hungarian leader, Louis Kossuth, speak to a vast multitude at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on the historic Hudson. After a long and bloody contest the Hungarian rebellion of 1849 was crushed by the combined armies of Austria and Russia. Louis Kossuth, the leader of that revolution, took refuge in Turkey. His extradition was demanded by both Russia and Austria, but the Sultan refused to give him up. In order to save Kossuth from the vengeance of his foes the Congress of the United States, then in session, in violation of the basic principle of the Monroe doctrine, authorized the President of the United States to send a war vessel to Turkey to bring Kossuth to the United States. The President acted promptly and sent the man-of-war Mississippi, Capt. Long commanding, to the harbor of Smyrna, and brought Gen. Kossuth to the United States. An official banquet was given Kossuth by both the Senate and House of Representatives—a banquet at which Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State; Gen. Cass; and the leading statesmen of that day made notable addresses, fully justifying the bold and drastic action of Congress.

As high authority as Prof. Hiram Bingham, of Yale University, a profound student and scholar in the broad domain of civics, in a great little book on the Monroe doctrine, declared that the Monroe doctrine is now an obsolete shibboleth so far as the United States is concerned. The circumstances under which President Monroe issued his famous defy in 1823, known as the Monroe doctrine, justifies the opinion that it was issued solely to meet an emergency. It was issued when the Central and South American Provinces of Spain were seething with revolution. The Province of Nicaragua proclaimed her independence of the Spanish yoke in 1821. Venezuela won her revolution against Spain the same year of President Monroe's message. The same year the Central American Province of Honduras proclaimed her independence. Guatemala rebelled in 1821, but did not succeed in throwing off the Spanish yoke until 1823. The great Empire of Brazil was in revolt in 1823 with the erratic Dom Pedro proclaiming himself as Emperor. In 1823 Mexico was also in chaos and revolution. Only a year previous—July 21, 1822—the first Mexican Congress met, and Gen. Santa Anna proclaimed himself the head of the Republic. Spain had failed to reconquer Mexico, and appealed to the so-called Holy Alliance of Europe to come to the rescue and save her South and Central American Provinces for monarchical absolutism. Peru was also in revolution, and did not defeat the armies of Spain until a year later—1824. It was the appeals by Spain to the Holy Alliance that caused President Monroe to issue his now world-famous proclamation embodying the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe message was issued not to proclaim a new national policy but to meet an emergency. It was in response to a national instinct for safeguarding our new Republic, then in infancy, having less than 10,000,000 people. It was issued to safeguard our integrity as a young and struggling Republic by securing the environment of other neighboring republics, and encourage and uphold the patriotic efforts of other peoples who were struggling to resist the threatened invasion of the old-world monarchies, especially the so-called Holy Alliance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What was this Holy Alliance that President Monroe in his message to Congress in 1823 issued his defy against? This Holy Alliance was a league born in September, 1815, after the Battle of Waterloo had sent Napoleon into exile. It was formed by Alexander the First of Russia, Emperor Francis of Austria, William the Third of Prussia, and indorsed by nearly all the second-class powers of Europe. This Holy Alliance was formed to preserve monarchical absolutism in Europe, and secondarily to see to it that no member of the Bonaparte family should ever occupy any throne in Europe. That President Monroe mainly issued his famous message embodying the Monroe doctrine against any interference by this alliance is a well-established fact. Prof. Peck in his new International Encyclopedia says:

The most noteworthy attempt of this holy alliance was to extend its operation to the New World by the coercion of Spain's revolting colonies.

It can be stated as one of the absolute verities that President Monroe issued his famous message as an emergency measure and as a notice to the Holy Alliance that we would not tolerate on this continent any interference with the struggling peoples of South America, who were at that time in war and revolution to throw off the yoke of Spain. He issued that message as a notice and a menace that in the future our environment in Central and South America should be the sympathetic environment of Republics, and not the environment of the Old World dynasties. Hence I will repeat the statement that, in the spirit and purpose of the Monroe doctrine, it is our duty to see to it that no dictator or usurper of the constitutional authority of the Republic of Mexico shall be allowed to inaugurate monarchical absolutism for free constitutional government in Mexico.

The Monroe doctrine was proclaimed to meet a critical emergency when the Central and South American Republics were weak and struggling. To-day they are strong. They repudiate our guardianship absolutely. They are strong and militant now and do not fear European colonization or either European or Asiatic aggression. The Monroe doctrine, in the language of Prof. Bingham, of Yale University, is now an "obsolete shibboleth." It has no legitimate place in the solution of the present crisis in Mexico. We must settle this question, as we are capable of settling it, in the interest of humanity and permanent peace. We must settle it in accord with our highest national instincts and our best interests of to-day, in the light and knowledge of to-day, and not wander back a hundred years to look for advice and precedents at a time when the whole Central and South American colonies were weak and struggling for autonomy and constitutional government.

The latest development in the Mexican crisis proves that President Wilson acted with the sanest judgment in refusing to recognize the Huerta rule in Mexico. And the people of the United States have full faith in the ability and mental alertness of the President to solve the delicate and difficult problems involved without resort to war and in accord with our best-grounded national instincts.

INCOME-TAX LAW.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday morning I asked for the printing as a document of the synopsis of the provisions of the income-tax law as to individuals, prepared by Mr. HULL, of Tennessee, and upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] it went over until to-day for the purpose of ascertaining about what number could be printed under this kind of a request. I have been trying to find out from the Public Printer, and have not been able to do so up to this moment. I do not find Mr. Smith out here at present; but I believe, however, that a sufficient number to answer the purpose I had in view, of assisting Members to answer inquiries, can be printed within the limit of $500 allowed on this kind of an order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I read the statement in the RECORD this morning prepared by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], and really I can not see that it is very much shorter or clearer than the income-tax law itself; and it seems to me that before we send out even a shorter statement it ought to be one that is approved by the Treasury Department officials, because if we send out a statement of what the law means, the people will believe that is done with some authority and may be misled by it. I could not make up my income-tax return from the law itself or from the statement of Judge HULL without further information.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, of course if there is going to be objection to the request I will not make it.

Mr. MANN. What the gentleman ought to do would be to have that statement in some way passed upon by the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, or whoever is going to have charge of the collection of the income tax, so that when it goes out it is after it has been approved in some way by those officials who administer the law.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the request for the present.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the sweet-wine industry, a great industry in the State of California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his request, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of sweet wines of California.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman wish to insert a speech or a lot of documents?

Mr. RAKER. I shall go into the matter fully and intend to cover the various features of it, giving my own views—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not intend to insert a lot of documents?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think I shall insert any documents; that is my idea now. There may be some small extracts that may be inserted in order to make the matter clear.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—I will waive that for the present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein a letter from Frank Davey, of Burns, Oreg., to the Secretary of Agriculture, suggesting a remedy for the beef shortage. Mr. Davey is thoroughly conversant with the range situation in the West and is the first one to make the suggestion set forth in his letter, which suggestion I think deserves careful consideration, for I think it a valuable one and if acted upon will tend to restore our beef supply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the beef supply. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

THE HARNEY COUNTY NEWS,
Burns, Oreg., September 30, 1913.

HON. SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Will you permit a suggestion from a country editor who realizes the depleted condition of the herds of meat-producing animals in the United States and the consequent high price of such products to the consumer?

I notice a dispatch of the 27th from Washington disclosing a "message of hope for the reduction of the price of beef to less than half" when the completion of the Panama Canal shall permit the importation of it from Peru and Argentina, and I have noticed before, as well as in that dispatch, that Australia is now able to land beef in New York at from 7 to 10 cents per pound.

The thought inspired from this information may not be worth considering, but I will submit it. If those countries can transport beef enough at such figures to affect the markets of this country and to supply a reasonable percentage of it for consumption here, they must be well stocked with cattle and the animals must be cheap. Could not your department do something toward bringing a few hundred thousand head of yearlings and calves from those countries to restock the great ranges of the West, or even to distribute in small numbers to farmers all over the Nation, so as to once more replenish the stock at home, thus utilizing our wasting pastures and working out our meat problem among ourselves?

Under your department are millions of acres of forest reserves, and if there is any great proportion of them similar to the reserves in this part of Oregon there is sufficient grass going to waste every year and menacing the country with fire possibilities to maintain and fatten enough cattle to bring down the price of beef in every city in the Union.

The Government has its own ships in which such cattle could be transported; it could send reliable men quietly into those countries to select and purchase the young stock desired, and you could have them distributed among the several States, to be disposed of through the agricultural colleges and experiment stations, and the States could be allowed the privilege of having them grazed in the forest reserves pending their disposal to the citizens, the States to pay the General Government and the citizens to pay the State.

I am not generally credited with being a crank or impractical theorist, yet this proposition may be considered without merit, infeasible, and out of the question. If so, all right; nothing lost only a little time for me to write and you to read it.

With great respect,

Yours, very sincerely,

FRANK DAVEY.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of why our foreign trade is growing.

Mr. MANN. Our foreign trade has been growing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of why our foreign trade is growing. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes had it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 34, answered "present" 10, not voting 287, as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT with Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BURKE, is not here. I am paired with him. I voted "nay" on the proposition, and I would like to vote "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. CARY was called, and he voted "present."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay" on the roll call, but I am paired with the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CONNELLY, and I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan was called, and he voted "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly, under its previous order, the House (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, October 20, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Legislature of North Carolina, requesting Congress to investigate the interpretation and administration of the act to regulate interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 8947) to authorize the Postmaster General to extend the Free Delivery Mail Service to towns and villages of 1,000 population or over; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BREMNER: A bill (H. R. 8948) to establish a bureau of industrial safety and to provide for its powers and duties; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 8949) to amend section 9 of paragraph 6 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SABATH: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 141) that it is the sense of the American Congress that the principles of justice and the interests of civilization demand that the charges that Mendel Beilis committed "ritual murder" be withdrawn; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 8950) granting a pension to Ezekiel S. Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONOHUE: A bill (H. R. 8951) authorizing Capt. P. H. Uberroth, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, and Gunner Carl Johansson, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, to accept watches tendered to them by the Canadian Government; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. GLASS: A bill (H. R. 8952) granting an increase of pension to Florence P. Percy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8953) granting a pension to Daniel Engler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LIEB: A bill (H. R. 8954) granting an increase of pension to Louis Krott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN: A bill (H. R. 8955) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Halls; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8956) granting an increase of pension to Clark Christopher; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8957) granting an increase of pension to Absalom Board; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BELL of California: Memorial of the Pasadena Board of Trade, of Pasadena, Cal., protesting against the Secretary of the Interior granting rights of way over Government land for the diversion of water from the Grand River basin to certain corporations and individuals; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: Evidence in support of House bill 3080, for the relief of William S. Rote; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, evidence in support of House bill 3584, granting an honorable discharge to Edward Hilsher; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, favoring a change in the interstate-commerce laws relative to mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WHITE: Petition of Ora Blizzard and 7 others, of Frazeysburg; Rucker Bros. and 3 others, of Lowell; Turner Ebinger Co. and 17 others, of Marietta; Morris Hardware Co. and 12 others, of McConnellsville; J. L. Wolfram and 6 others, of Malta; and W. E. Wootton and 6 others, of Stockport, all in the State of Ohio, favoring the passage of legislation compelling concerns selling goods direct to the consumer by mail to contribute their portion of the funds for the development of the local community, county, and State; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 18, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

COTTON TIES AND BAGGING (S. DOC. NO. 213).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting in response to a resolution of July 18, 1913, reports prepared in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, on the recent advance in the price of bagging used in baling cotton, and also the advance in the price of ties used in handling or baling cotton, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 767. An act granting permission to the city of Marshfield, Oreg., to close Mill Slough in said city; and

S. 3296. An act to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8702. An act to authorize the county of Miami, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Wabash River in Miami County, Ind.;

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913; and

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to provide for furnishing the additional rooms in the House Office Building.

ISSUE OF TRAVELERS' CHECKS.

Mr. KERN. I present the petition of John Overmyer, a prominent citizen of Indiana. As it is short and contains matter of general interest, I ask to have it read.

There being no objection, the petition was read, as follows:

NORTH VERNON, IND., September 22, 1913.

HON. JOHN W. KERN,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I respectfully request that you present the following petition to the Senate: That the Senate add a section to the Glass-Owen currency bill providing that all travelers' checks shall be issued by the national reserve banks, and that a tax be laid on all such checks issued by any other bank, corporation, partnership, or person sufficient to cause the whole business of issuing such checks to be thrown into the hands of such reserve banks. All other national banks will, of course, be made agents for the issuing of such checks by the reserve banks. Checks so issued under such express provision of law will have behind them the whole consolidated banking power of all the banks in the United States so far as such banking power is represented by all the banks in the United States that do business under such currency bill. Checks so issued would be equal to, if not better than, Bank of England notes which pass as money all over the world. The issuing of such checks is a great business. The American Express Co. alone has a constant deposit of some $6,000,000 growing out of this business. The Hamburg-American and the North German-Lloyd Steamship Cos. issue a large amount of these checks in this country. Kuhn-Loeb & Co. and J. P. Morgan & Co., as also Thomas Cook & Sons, issue these checks largely. The American Bankers' Association also issues such checks, but their issuing such checks is ultra vires so far as the national banks are concerned, as no power to transact such business is granted by the national bank act. By conferring the power to issue such checks on the national reserve banks a deposit of from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 can be created for such reserve banks, which will constantly increase.

JOHN OVERMYER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM POPE, DECEASED.

Mr. BACON presented an affidavit in support of the bill (S. 3134) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of William Pope, deceased, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 3302) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections," approved January 26, 1907; to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 3303) granting a pension to Alfred G. Hawkins (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) to reimburse the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives for mileage and expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress; to the Committee on Appropriations.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to state that on Wednesday morning next, if the Senate should be in session, I desire to address some views in the hearing of the Senate in respect to the pending banking and currency bill, and especially respecting the great necessity of prompt and speedy action with a view to its passage at this session of Congress. If the Senate should not be in session on Wednesday, then at the very first opportunity I shall avail myself of the privilege of submitting the observations of which I have given notice.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record certain reports and arguments relating to the seamen's bill.

First, a report from the Commissioner of Navigation on H. R. 4616, which is on the same subject as the bill pending here, transmitted by the Secretary of Commerce to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce;

Second, a report to the Secretary of Commerce from the committee on efficiency of officers and crew, International Conference on Safety at Sea;

Third, a letter from Mr. Andrew Furuseth, addressed to the Secretary of Commerce in response to the last-named report;

Fourth, a letter to the Secretary of Commerce from Mr. H. H. Raymond on the subject; and Fifth, a letter from an attorney for vessel owners of the United States, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

(Department of Commerce, Inclosing memorandum from Commissioner of Navigation.)

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 3, 1913.

HON. JAMES P. CLARKE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the seamen's bill, H. R. 4616, I have received from the Commissioner of Navigation the memorandum concerning certain details thereof, of which copy is handed you for your consideration. I have taken the liberty at the same time of handing a copy of this memorandum to my colleague, the Secretary of Labor, so that you may both be informed of the suggestions made by Mr. Chamberlain.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

(Memorandum for Secretary Redfield. The Alexander seamen's bill, H. R. 4616.)

SEPTEMBER 29, 1913.

I have read attentively the joint report (copy attached) which you and Secretary Wilson made May 6 on the La Follette seamen's bill, S. 4. The Alexander bill on the same subject is much more carefully drawn both in substance and in form.

The following observations, which you have authorized me to present to you, do not conflict with your approval of the general principles of the legislation. They point out certain administrative difficulties and certain embarrassments arising from our agreements with other nations, most of which could not have been readily foreseen by the authors of the bill. These in every or nearly every instance can be met by changes in the bill which will not affect its general principles which you favor. As a practical business man, head of the department which must carry out the legislation, you appreciate the need of having the principles of the legislation reduced to concrete propositions which the department can administer.

DATE OF EFFECT.

The bill is to take effect as to vessels of the United States 90 days after its passage. This is too short a time to make preparations necessary to carry out some sections. The Hardy licensed-mates act of 1913 took effect on March 4, but you will recall it has taken over five months to put it into operation, and it applies to about 300 vessels and men compared with the seamen's bill applying to about 3,000 American vessels, thousands of men, and to vessels of foreign nations. I wish you would speak with Assistant Secretary Sweet on this phase.

(a) Some sections could take effect after 60 days' notice—the time needed to print and distribute department circulars throughout the country.

(b) Other sections should not take effect until after six months' notice.

(c) The thirteenth section (able seamen), which the Seamen's Union deems the most important, creates a new rating, and in effect extends the principle of license now applied to officers of steam vessels to the deck crews of all vessels of 100 tons gross or over, except on rivers (perhaps 4,000 steam, motor, and sail vessels and barges). The application of this section to American vessels alone will require considerable administrative machinery (steamboat-inspection force, collectors of customs force, and probably shipping commissioners' force), and I believe it ought not to take effect until after the beginning of the next fiscal year, July 1, 1914, so we can provide for it in deficiency estimates next winter. We must at least point out the situation to Congress to avoid the charge of lack of foresight. Of course, if we can not get the money to carry out the bill and Congress nevertheless passes it, the responsibility for failure to administer it can not legitimately be charged against the department.

SAFETY AT SEA.

The same thirteenth section deals with the efficiency of crews, and is applicable to foreign as well as to domestic vessels. The subject matter, as you know, is of at least equal importance with lifeboats and other subjects before the international conference to meet at London on November 12. I think a more durable and practical conclusion can be reached after the conference than before it. Be this as it may, the British Government, in the ambassador's note of July 25, asked the United States to await the results of the conference before allowing the bill to become a law, and the German Government, in the ambassador's note of July 15, took the view that the willingness of the United States to take part in the conference can not be reconciled with the settlement in advance by Congress of questions before the conference. I doubt whether these requests should be ignored.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DESERTION.

Five pages (pp. 8, 9, 10, 18, and 19, sections 7, 8, 15, and 16) of the bill out of 20 are almost exclusively devoted to the abolition of the penalty of imprisonment for the desertion of seamen from American or foreign ships. In this country there is virtually no opposition to this proposition, which was favored by the Democratic and Republican national platforms. The year's notice of termination of treaties is carefully provided in sections 15 and 16. These provisions of the bill—involuntary servitude—were doubtless in your mind when you recommended early action on the La Follette bill. They have no direct bearings on safety at sea and do not require international action beyond the notice of termination of treaties.

HOURS OF LABOR AND HOLIDAYS.

The second section is one of the most important sections of the bill and should be entirely clear. The meaning to be given to the words "while at sea" is uncertain. Narrowly construed they would mean on salt water outside of headlands (case 68176-n); more broadly construed they might include voyages on the Great Lakes as well as on the ocean; and still more broadly construed they might mean any vessel when under way. An expression fixing the exact intended scope of the section which will not have to be carried to the courts for interpretation should be found.

SUBSTITUTES.

The first section of the bill deals with substitutes. This subject was treated in the first section of the Hardy licensed-mates act of March 3, 1913, which has probably been overlooked. The Hardy provision applies generally, while section 1 of this bill applies only to vessels in foreign trade. The Hardy provision applies to steam vessels; section 1 applies to steam and sail. Section 1 would repeal part of the Hardy Act. The first section, therefore, should be rewritten in view of the Hardy Act. The two sections follow:

"ALEXANDER BILL.

"SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections."

"HARDY ACT.

"If any such vessel is deprived of the services of any number of the crew without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any person interested in the vessel, the vessel may proceed on her voyage if, in the judgment of the master, she is sufficiently manned for such voyage: Provided, That the master shall ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same grade or of a higher rating with those whose places they fill. If the master shall fail to explain in writing the cause of such deficiency in the crew to the local inspectors within 12 hours of the time of the arrival of the vessel at her destination, he shall be liable to a penalty of $50. If the vessel shall not be manned as provided in this act, the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $100, or, in case of an insufficient number of licensed officers, to a penalty of $500."

WAGES.

(a) The third section doubles the penalty for delay in paying a seaman his wages earned. This section should be passed at once, to take effect in 90 days.

(b) The fourth section provides for the payment of half the wages due to seamen at intermediate ports where cargo is loaded or discharged during a voyage. The law now permits such payment unless the contrary is stipulated in the articles, as is frequently done. This part of the section could be passed at once to take effect in 90 days.

The closing proviso of the section, applying this rule for paying wages for foreign ships, is contrary to various treaties and conventions, and we shall break faith with these nations unless we first give notice of our purpose to abrogate such treaties. The notice contained in section 15 of the bill must be extended to cover payment of wages as well as imprisonment for desertion. This part of the bill, therefore, could not take effect for over a year.

(c) The eleventh section prohibits all allotments of wages in American ports to seamen on American or foreign vessels. Without additional legislation the Commissioner of Navigation already has authority to stop allotments, which have been gradually reduced. I have not exercised this authority to its full extent because, as I have advised you, I believe to cut off all allotments would impede our foreign commerce, particularly at the cotton-export and bunker-coal ports, and that the resulting injury to labor ashore would be much greater than the possible gain to seamen from the prohibition of allotments. This matter is of slight concern to American shipowners, but it may materially affect American exporters, especially at southern ports where seamen are scarce. I may be mistaken as to the effect of stopping allotments, and if as the head of the Department of Commerce you wish me to do so, I will prepare regulations cutting down by one-half the present allotment schedule, to take effect January 1, 1914, and cutting off all allotments on April 1, 1914. This will give fair notice to all concerned, and if for any reason the results should not prove satisfactory it would be possible to retrace our steps.

NOTE.—The Supreme Court of the United States has upheld our authority under the allotment law, and the question of contracts for wages of seamen on foreign ships made in the United States is quite different from the question of such contracts made abroad.

(d) The twelfth section extends to fishermen's wages the exemption from attachment now extended to seamen's wages. At page 15, line 7, the word "title" should read "act," and in line 9 the word "other" should be omitted, because the courts and laws distinguish between merchant seamen and fishermen. This section could be passed at once, to take effect in 90 days.

FORECASTLES.

Our statutory requirements for fore-castle accommodations are much below foreign requirements. The sixth section deals with this subject, but not fully. It begins inadvertently by wiping out the laws governing the subject on ships built before this act, and if passed in this form we will have no law to enforce upon older vessels. Last year I studied with some care the German, French, Norwegian, and British laws on the subject, and Appendix A is a substitute for the sixth section of the bill, and includes the best features of those laws and I believe will be recognized as distinctly better than the sixth section for new vessels. We have practically ceased to build sail vessels, so the substitute related mainly to steamers and the larger motor boats.

SEAWORTHINESS AND PROVISIONS.

(a) The fifth section enables the majority of the crew, without the concurrence of an officer, to demand a consular survey as to seaworthiness, quantity and quality of provisions, etc.

(b) The tenth section adds a quart to the daily allowance of water and an ounce to the daily allowance of butter. These two sections can be carried out at any times after 90 days' notice—sufficient to advise American consuls.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

The new part of the ninth section provides that when a mate maltreats a seaman and the master does not turn him over to the authorities the owner of the vessel shall be liable in damages for the maltreatment by the mate. I think you will wish to ask Mr. Thurman about this.

BARGES.

Section 14 requires the Department of Commerce to report annually concerning accidents to barges at sea, doubtless as a basis for future legislation. This section, of course, can be carried out at any time.

E. T. CHAMBERLAIN, Commissioner.

SEC. 6. That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation," approved March 3, 1897, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"The collector or other officer of customs shall not issue a register, enrollment, or license to any merchant vessel of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after July 1, 1914, except fishing vessels, yachts, pilot boats, and all vessels under 200 gross tons, unless he shall be satisfied by inspection that the provisions of this act have been complied with; and he shall from time to time note on such document the number of the crew the vessel may carry in compliance with this section.

"PAR. A. (1) Every space appropriated to the crew of such vessel shall be securely constructed, drained, and properly protected from weather and sea, and shall have a space of not less than 120 cubic feet and not less than 18 square feet measured on the floor or deck of that place for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein. If such space have inclined sides, the superficial area may be computed at one-half the height instead of on the deck.

"(2) The spaces appropriated to the crew shall include a compartment properly built and separated from other spaces for hospital purposes on all such merchant vessels which in the ordinary course of their trade make voyages on the ocean of more than three days' duration between ports. If the number of the crew shall exceed 12, and such compartment shall have at least 1 bunk for each multiple of 12 seamen up to 6 bunks.

"(3) The spaces for the crew shall have wooden flooring or be covered with some substance impervious to water which may be easily cleaned and is a nonconductor of heat. The sides and ceilings shall be painted in a light oil color, and iron ceilings, if used, must be provided with a covering to prevent dripping.

"(4) No space for crew accommodation shall be deducted from gross tonnage unless there is permanently cut in a beam and over the doorway of such space the number of men it is allowed to accommodate with these words: 'Certified to accommodate — seamen.'

"(5) Every space occupied by the crew shall be kept free from goods or stores of any kind not being the personal property of the crew in use during the voyage; and if any such place is not so kept free, the master shall forfeit and pay to each seaman or apprentice lodged in that place the sum of 50 cents for each day during which any goods or stores as aforesaid are kept or stored in the place after complaint has been made to him by any two or more of the seamen so lodged.

"PAR. B. (1) Each such space shall be sufficiently open to daylight.

"(2) Shall be provided with sufficient artificial illumination at night and in dark weather.

"(3) Shall be provided with sufficient ventilation by ports or doors, and, in addition, with artificial appliances for sufficient ventilation when ports are closed, to be so arranged that the cold current shall not pass directly over the berths.

"(4) Shall be properly heated during cold weather.

"(5) Shall be properly shut off as far as practicable from the effluvia of cargo or bilge water.

"(6) Each seaman or apprentice shall be allowed a berth for his sole use at least 2 feet in width and at least 6 feet in length, and the distance between the floor and the bottom of the lower berth shall be at least 10 inches, and, except for the berthing of Asiatics, not more than two berths shall be in a tier.

"(7) Where a mess room separate from sleeping quarter is not provided for the seamen, the crew spaces shall be provided with tables and seats for at least one-half of the crew, excluding Asiatics.

"PAR. C. Every merchant vessel of the United States propelled by machinery the construction of which shall be begun after July 1, 1914, having, exclusive of licensed officers, a crew of 20 or more, except fishing vessels, yachts, pilot boats, and vessels under 200 gross tons, shall have for the use of the crew:

"(1) At least one light, clean, and properly heated wash room, which shall be provided with at least one washbasin for each two men of a watch, except those for whom individual washing accommodations are provided elsewhere.

"(2) A special wash room for the engine department, if it consists of more than 10 persons, exclusive of licensed officers, so situated that the men can reach it on the way from the engines, boilers, or coal bunkers before entering their quarters, and of such size that at least a sixth of the engine department, exclusive of licensed officers, can wash at the same time. It shall be provided with running water and with at least one shower bath for each four of the watch and with at least one washbasin for each two men of the watch, except those for whom individual washing and bathing accommodations are provided elsewhere. Cold and hot water shall be supplied in sufficient quantities and at least 2 gallons of fresh water shall be available for the use of each man of the engine department at the end of his watch.

"(3) The sides and ceilings of the wash rooms shall be painted in light oil color, and the wash room shall be cleaned at least daily.

"PAR. D. After such vessel has been registered, enrolled, or licensed—

"(1) For any violation of the requirements of paragraphs A, B, or C in construction or equipment the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $500, for the recovery of which the vessel may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in the district court of the United States for any district within which such vessel may be found.

"(2) For any willful or continued violation of any of the requirements of paragraphs A (except 5), B, or C relating to maintenance in condition for use of construction, appliances, or supplies therein provided for the master shall be liable to a penalty of $50, and, in addition, shall be liable to the suspension or revocation of his license in the manner now provided for such penalty in case of violation of the steamboat-inspection laws and regulations.

"(3) For any act or damage to or fouling or waste of any of the construction, appliances, or supplies provided for in paragraphs A, B, or C willfully committed by him a seaman shall be liable to the forfeiture of — days' pay, and if the offense be repeated on the same voyage to double that penalty."

REPORT TO THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE OF THE COMMITTEE ON EFFICIENCY OF OFFICERS AND CREWS—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SAFETY AT SEA.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, September 13, 1913.

To HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary of Commerce.

SIR: The Committee on Efficiency of Officers and Crews submits the following report for the consideration of the Secretary of Commerce in the preparation of data for the use of the delegates of the United States to the International Conference on Safety at Sea.

The committee organized May 16, 1913, and has held seven meetings. After some study of the laws of other nations relating to the efficiency of officers and crews, of foreign reports and of bills pending in the Congress of the United States, with the accompanying testimony and reports, bearing more or less directly upon the subject, the committee on June 7 sent the attached letter of inquiry (appendix) to the principal American ocean steamship companies, to maritime exchanges and chambers of commerce at our largest seaports, to organizations of masters and mates, engineers and seamen, to representative American ship captains, and to others, the results of whose experience might be helpful to the committee. Thirty-two replies have been carefully considered.

At the outset the committee cordially concurs with the following views expressed in the closing paragraph of the report on May 15, 1913, of the British Departmental Committee on Boats and Davits:

"The efficiency of the arrangements for saving life at sea depends as much upon the competency of the officers and crew as upon the life-saving appliances on board. The boats and other appliances require efficient crews to handle them. Strict discipline and obedience are essential."

The efficiency of officers of merchant vessels is already determined in accord with regulations established by the principal maritime nations, which, though differing somewhat in scope and detail, are reasonably similar in the standards required.

1. Discipline and obedience to orders are the first essentials to efficient crews, but these are matters for local legislation and custom rather than international agreement.

2. The physical condition and health of seamen and the sanitary conditions under which they pursue their calling enter into the problem of efficiency and in our opinion are proper subjects of international regulation. Conclusions on these subjects, however, must be based on medical and hygienic investigation and we are in doubt whether the program of the conference provides for the consideration of this subject or whether the duration of the conference will permit the investigation and discussion necessary to authoritative conclusions.

3. Training of the crews is the second essential to efficiency and the standards for such training are proper and necessary subjects for international regulation.

4. The basis of such training, so far as safety is concerned, should be the fire drill, closing bulkhead doors, and lifeboat drills.

OCEAN PASSENGER STEAMERS.

5. Lifeboat drill may be divided into two parts:

(a) Training of the crew of each lifeboat in the swinging out and lowering of boats, direction and stowing of passengers, use of oars and other equipment.

(b) Training of the entire crew as a unit in their duties when it becomes necessary to abandon ship.

6. The efficiency of the crew as a unit can be attained only by frequent and thorough drills of the entire crew, or at least of not less than a full watch of all departments.

Such drills should take place:

- (a) After the ship has left the wharf on her voyage.
- (b) As a general rule once a week.

7. Lifeboats may be divided into two classes:

Class I—

- (a) Boats under davits.
- (b) Collapsible or decked lifeboats.

Class II. Life rafts—

- (a) Each boat of Class I should have at least three efficient boat hands (as hereinafter defined), including the officer or petty officer in charge of the boat.
- (b) Each life raft (Class II) should have at least one efficient boat hand.

8. Definition.—An efficient boat hand shall be a man trained in the launching, lowering, detaching, and handling of boats and the use of oars and shall also have served at least one year on vessels navigating the ocean, bays, sounds, or large inland seas or lakes.

9. The efficient boat hand shall have a Government certificate as such, which shall be recognized by other Governments reciprocally.

10. Asiatics may be certificated as efficient boat hands provided they meet the prescribed standards and also can understand and answer the orders of the officers relating to lifeboat service and duties.

11. Crews should be drilled at fire quarters and closing bulkhead doors where such exist at least once a week.

CARGO STEAMERS.

In view of the material differences between passenger and cargo steamers and of the further fact that the establishment of a new rating—efficient boat hand—has been recommended for ocean passenger steamers which will require time to carry out, the committee makes no recommendation for cargo steamers beyond the requirement of weekly boat and fire drills.

LOOKOUTS.

12. Seamen shall not serve as lookouts on ocean passenger steamers unless they have been examined as to acuity of vision, color sense, and hearing, and have Government certificates thereto; provided that ship surgeons or other reputable physicians or oculists may issue temporary certificates in cases where a Government medical officer is not accessible.

HEARING AND VISION OF OFFICERS.

13. In our judgment all licensed officers (including engineers) in the merchant marine should be required to pass tests for hearing, and all navigating or deck officers should be required also to pass tests for color sense and acuity of vision. These tests should be applied by Government medical officers—in the United States by officers of the Public Health Service. The tests should be practical and reasonable:

- (a) For hearing we suggest the requirement of ability to understand the words of ordinary conversation at 30 feet; (b) for acuity of vision, using the Snellen test card, we suggest a standard without spectacles of 20/20 vision in one eye and at least 20/40 in the other, provided that a candidate whose vision without glasses is less than this standard but not below 20/40 in one eye and 20/70 in the other who can show a corrected vision with spectacles of 20/20 in one eye and 20/40 in the other may be accepted; (c) tests for color sense should be made with the Holmgren worsteds or similar method.

14. Licensed officers at the end of five-year periods should be reexamined as to color sense, acuity of vision, and hearing, but slightly lower standards for acuity of vision and hearing would seem proper in view of the officer's increased experience.

HENRY M. SEELEY,
Supervising Inspector, Second District, Steamboat-Inspection Service.

W. J. PETTUS,
Assistant Surgeon General, Public Health Service.

The above report is signed by me, subject to the reservation that I believe it unwise for the committee to confine itself to the recommendation that boat drills should take place "after the ship has left the wharf on her voyage" (p. 2, sec. 6a), and after the word "certificate," section 9, add the words "of discharge."

1. While I fully realize the importance of both boat and fire drills on shipboard, and know that without proper training of ships' crews by such drills the effectiveness of the elaborate equipment now required and further contemplated on board would be reduced to a minimum, I have considerable doubt as to the advisability of our committee confining itself to the recommendation that boat drills should take place "after the ship has left the wharf on her voyage."

2. Considering the practical side of that recommendation as I see it, and taking trans-Atlantic voyages as a base and, say, the port of New York as a point of departure, the bay and harbor of which are second to none in North America or northern Europe for facilities for holding such drills, I believe that to stop one of the large trans-Atlantic liners in that harbor or bay, even under the most favorable weather conditions, for the purpose of holding drills, might prove a menace to navigation, not only to the ship on which such drills are held but to the vessels constantly navigating in the vicinity. Unfavorable wind and tide would necessitate much maneuvering of the ship before being brought to a safe anchorage in order that drills be held. The same danger is afterwards present when maneuvering for a position to proceed to sea. The danger would be much greater in the event of unsettled weather or threatening mist or fog.

3. It is essential to general safety that a ship proceed to sea with all consistent speed after leaving her wharf, in order to avoid the dangers incident to congested waters and possible unfavorable conditions arising, such as fog, mist, snow, etc.

4. Considering the North Atlantic Ocean after leaving the United States or Europe as a suitable place for holding drills, I feel safe in saying that for months and months a ship may traverse the Atlantic without having an opportunity for holding an efficient boat drill. The drills contemplated by the committee, as I understand it, are to consist of lowering the boats to the water and the necessary hoisting of them on board again. They might often be lowered to the water in unfavorable weather on the ocean, and passengers safely disembarked, but in all probability many of the boats would be seriously damaged in process of being again hoisted on board, and thus rendered unavailable on the passage in the event of actual necessity arising for their use for abandoning the ship.

5. Another matter for consideration in connection with holding of boat drills at sea "after the ship has left the wharf on her voyage" is the danger of a panic, due to the presence of a large number of foreign emigrants on board, who do not understand the official language spoken on board, and even if they are made to comprehend that the swinging out of the boats is for drills only, will not believe it. Several cases of a panic due to such drills at sea have been called to my attention.

6. Another consideration, although commercial and secondary, is worthy of attention. The probable time required for boat drill "after the ship has left her wharf on her voyage" on one of the large trans-Atlantic liners carrying, say, about 60 lifeboats, would be, according to weather conditions, from, say, two to five hours, including rehoisting and securing of boats, and the question arises, Do conditions of the past or probable conditions in the future warrant this delay to the traveling public and to the United States and foreign mails and the attendant risk and danger as above outlined?

The lesson learned from the most deplorable disaster known, in the loss of life due to the sinking of the Titanic, is that the loss of life, as I understand it, was not due to a lack of discipline or training in connection with the lowering and handling of lifeboats, but rather from an insufficient number of lifeboats to accommodate all passengers. Some of the boats of the Titanic, I understand, were not fully loaded, not because of a lack of training in their handling but because passengers would not go into those that first left the ship.

I suggest, in connection with boat drills once each week, weather permitting, as already recommended, that all boats under davits be swung out at least once each month, and a number of them lowered, so that all boats must have been in the water at least once in six months, the report of same to be entered in the ship's log book.

I also suggest for consideration that as all departments are to be drawn upon for boat hands, that each lifeboat of Class I should have efficient boat hands, as defined, equal to 10 per cent of the number of persons the lifeboat is certified to carry; that is to say, a lifeboat certified for 50 persons would require 5 of that number to be efficient boat hands.

7. I further suggest that section 9, on page 2, be amended in the first line, immediately following the word "certificate," by adding the words "of discharge," this certificate to be included in the current official "certificate of discharge," as now signed by the master, and who shall be the judge of efficiency of the boat hand, as he now is of the sailor's "character" and "capacity."

HENRY M. SEELEY,
United States Supervising Inspector, Second District.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, June 7, 1913.

SIR: The committee designated by the Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, to collect information and submit a report to him upon "Efficiency of officers and crews" of merchant vessels for the use of the American delegation to the International Conference on Safety at Sea incloses a list of questions, and would be pleased to receive your views upon the subjects thus outlined.

The committee shares in Secretary Redfield's regret that no appropriation has been made to carry out his original purpose to include in the membership of this committee expert representatives of the various organizations and companies intimately concerned with the subjects assigned as well as Government officers. Accordingly we request your cooperation through correspondence.

It would aid the work of the committee if your replies could be forwarded during June. Replies should be addressed to Commissioner of Navigation, Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

Respectfully,

W. J. PETTUS,
Assistant Surgeon General, Public Health Service.

Commissioner of Navigation, Chairman.

SAFETY AT SEA—EFFICIENCY OF OFFICERS AND CREWS.

I. STANDARDS FOR MANNING LIFEBOATS.

Passenger steamers: The efficient manning of lifeboats of passenger steamers involves launching and handling of the boats and their equipment, swinging out, direction and stowing of passengers, lowering, detaching, hoisting, and use of cars.

A. Should standards be established—

(1) By statute?

(2) By regulation of the Steamboat-Inspection Service?

B. (1) Should the standard be based on years of service on deck; should the standard be service for one, two, or three years?

(2) Should the standard be based on practical tests of the man's ability to perform the work involved in manning lifeboats? Should such tests be conducted by and certified to by Government officers?

(3) Should the standard be based both on deck service and on practical tests?

C. (1) What minimum number of the crew for each lifeboat under davits should be required to conform to such standard of efficiency?

(2) What minimum number of the crew for collapsible boats, life rafts, etc., should be required to conform to such standard?

D. Are members of the engine department and of the steward's department, by previous occupation or by training on shipboard, competent for lifeboat service?

E. (1) Assuming that the crew must be trained and organized as a whole as to the duties of each member in case it is necessary to take to the boats, can this training be secured without a drill at which all lifeboats are lowered with the crews in them?

(2) Does the personnel of the crew change so frequently that such a drill should take place once for each voyage?

F. In the case of Asiatics or other seamen who, through lack of knowledge of the language of officers, do not understand orders, what provision should be made? Should they be wholly or partly ineligible for certain duties; and if so, what duties and to what extent?

Cargo steamers: Please consider the same subjects in their relation to crews of cargo steamers, on which, through the absence of passengers, including women and children, the problems are much simpler.

II. STANDARD TESTS—HEARING OF LICENSED OFFICERS.

1. The present regulations require tests for color sense and vision by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service for the original license issued to masters, mates, and pilots, but require no examination by medical officers for hearing, as is prescribed by certain foreign countries. Candidates' hearing is now tested by the local inspectors of steam vessels.

(a) In your judgment, should the examination for original licenses of licensed officers (including engineers) require tests for hearing by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service?

(b) Would you deem the requirement of ability to hear a whispered voice at 10 feet or tones of ordinary conversation at 30 feet a fair test?

III. STANDARD TESTS—RENEWAL OF LICENSES.¹

In your judgment, should the same requirements for vision and hearing be prescribed for the renewal of licenses as for the issue of original licenses?

IV. STANDARD TESTS—LOOKOUTS, ETC.¹

In view of their important work, lookout men, steersmen, and quartermasters under the law of several countries are subjected to medical tests for color sense and vision.

(a) In your judgment, should seamen serving as lookout men, steersmen, and quartermasters be subjected to tests for color sense and hearing by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service and certificates thereof be furnished?

(b) Should the tests for color sense and hearing be the same as for licensed officers?

(c) Should tests for acuteness of vision of lookout men, steersmen, and quartermasters be made without glasses, since it is not their custom or practice to wear them?

(d) Would a requirement of 20/30 vision in one eye and 20/40 in the other eye without glasses be a fair test? (The test mentioned means that at 20 feet the candidate is able to read with one eye that which the normal eye should read at 30 feet. With the other eye the candidate must be able to read at 20 feet what the normal eye should read at 40 feet.)

V. POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF STANDARD TESTS.¹

Would you favor requiring all seamen of the deck department to be tested for vision, color sense, and hearing, the tests in these cases to be the same standard as for licensed officers; the testing for color sense in all cases to be made with the Holmgren worsteds, as prescribed in the regulations of the United States Public Health Service?

NATIONAL HOTEL,
Washington, D. C., October 6, 1913.

Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A report from the committee on efficiency of officers and crews, International Conference on Safety at Sea, was submitted to you under date of September 13, 1913.

This report is made up of recommendations, which, if adopted, would to such an extent lower the standard and skill that it is very difficult for me to understand how these recommendations could be made by men of experience. The question is one of promoting safety, and as I understand it, any expense within reason or any increase in inconvenience to shipowners is not to be permitted to stand in the way; such consideration should have little weight, because the expense is transmitted to the traveler, the shipper, and the general public, either through freight rates or insurance. It seems to me there can be no excuse for any reduction in standards of skill which promote safety from the existing standards set by law or the existing standards in daily practical experience to-day.

The present legal standard of skill in the crew as found in the statutes and in decisions are:

"The owner shall properly equip, man, and outfit said vessel and make such vessel seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage."

Among other decisions the case of In re Pacific Mail Steamship Co., C. C. V. 64, page 410, is cited as comparatively recent and upheld by the Supreme Court. In this case the court refused to grant the benefit of limited liability to the company because the crew was inefficient. The present presumption of law is that all the men shall be sufficiently skilled to understand and obey all orders; the further presumption is that these obligations rest upon all shipowners without regard to whether the vessel carries passengers or not; the law and the decisions alike take cognizance of the obvious fact that when two vessels meet it requires proper skill on board both to avoid a collision. The difficulty with the present situation is that the statute law of our country sets no definite standard of skill; it is a matter of decisions of the courts, each one resting upon testimony given by survivors; the gradual drift from the sea on the part of men of strength and skill has caused a gradual lowering of the practical standard. Up to the middle of the last century the laws and customs alike conspired to make it the shipowner's own vital interest to have the best men that could be obtained. The development of the present system of insurance and the adoption of the limited liability laws have resulted in a fundamental change in the shipowner's interest, and therefore in his point of view.

The statute law imposes no standard of skill, and the shipowners may therefore, except in the case of licensed officers, send their vessels to sea with men void of both experience and knowledge of the officers' language; yet with all this the traditions and customs that have grown up under former conditions are dying slowly, and vessels, as a general rule, have several men who are not only called able seamen, but who in experience and skill are really such; men trained under other and better conditions than the present are still obtainable to some considerable extent and are employed.

The recommendations of your committee seem to be based upon a paragraph quoted from a report made by the British committee on boats and davits to the effect that strict discipline and obedience are essential (in the crew). The crew must be able to understand and carry out the orders is the ruling of the courts; strict discipline and obedience is made the prerequisite in the recommendations by the British committee quoted and indorsed in this report; discipline is the ability to understand the orders and execute them; it is a result of training and experience, and the question arises, What training, how long experience? Germany answers, four years at sea; the English, the Australian, and the New Zealand laws answer, three years at sea; the British and Norwegian commissions recommend three years at sea. The lately adopted laws and the recommendations by commissions take cognizance of the change from sail to steam. The law of Great Britain was made three years at sea as a result of investigation and discussion running over more than 20 years. This law of Great Britain is ineffective in this, that while it sets a standard it does not compel the shipowner to carry any specified number of such men, the law having left this to the discretion of the board of trade.

¹ In case any candidate fails in the examination for color sense, he may be allowed a second examination upon the request of the proper officers. The Williams lantern for testing color sense, or some other lantern of equal merit, may be used for the second test.

The standard of efficiency recommended by your committee is the standard set for the man to be known as a "boat hand":

"The boat hand shall be a man trained in the lugging, lowering, detaching, and the handling of boats and the use of oars, and shall have served at least one year on vessels navigating the ocean, bays, sounds, or large inland seas or lakes."

The drill shall take place:

"As a general rule, once a week."

Let me try to illustrate this by using a trans-Atlantic liner: The liner makes about 12 trips a year; if the men remain with the vessel during a year—something almost unheard of—your efficient boat hand will have witnessed and perhaps participated in 24 boat drills. We know this to be a practical impossibility, because the conditions of weather and sea in the Atlantic would make it so full of danger that the boats ought not to be lowered except to save life. Let us assume that this man has been in a boat on the ocean 12 times. He has helped to swing it out 24 times and he may have done the real lowering perhaps 6 times. Real experts would not consider such men to be entitled to the rating of ordinary seamen, far less that of able seamen. Yet he is to have a "certificate from the Government." There is no provision for actual test of this man's ability, and the report of one member of the committee suggests to add after the word "certificate" the words "of discharge"; so that the certificate will be nothing more or less than the ordinary certificates of discharge issued by the master at this time and dependent purely upon his discretion, his likes or dislikes, of the man to whom it is given. If your committee had taken the worst-manned vessel as a standard, their recommendations would have been better than this. These boat hands may come from the deck, the fireroom, the engine room, the kitchen, or the saloon. The recommendations are three for each boat, one of whom is to be an officer or petty officer—that is to say, the person in charge of the boat may be an engineer, an oiler, a water tender, a chief steward—anybody with authority in any department of the vessel. A fireman coming from the heat of the fireroom with scant clothing, his pores open from the heat, is to go at once into a boat on the open ocean in the North Atlantic in the winter. How long will he last? The same applies to the engineer and the men coming from the sheltered saloon, though with less force. What are real experts to think of such rules as improving upon the present condition and for the purpose of promoting safety at sea? Politeness will induce them to cover their mouths with their hands.

One member of your committee criticizes the proposition to stop the vessel after she has left the dock and to train the men in abandoning vessels. His criticism is so obviously just and sensible that nothing said by me could improve upon it. Your committee further recommends rafts for some of the passengers and crews, and such raft is to have one such efficient boat hand in charge thereof. One wonders who are to go on the rafts. Presumably such of the crew as are not efficient boat hands and some steerage passengers. The men who have not been long enough at sea to be efficient boat hands as defined by your committee and the men from the steerage may not be willing to do this. They have absorbed none of the ethics or traditions of sea life, and more than likely it would be a question of who is the stronger. And the action might be based upon not women and children first but me first—let the devil take the hindmost.

I am loath to believe that any man with any real practical knowledge of the sea and its dangers would ever make any such recommendations or accept them as instructions.

Most respectfully and faithfully, yours,

ANDREW FURUSETH.

TO PROMOTE THE WELFARE OF AMERICAN SEAMEN IN THE MERCHANT MARINE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Letter from the Secretary of Commerce to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce transmitting a copy of a letter from H. H. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Association, relative to the bill S. 4, "A bill to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea."

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, May 21, 1913.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,

Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of a letter dated the 19th instant, from Mr. H. H. Raymond, president American Steamship Association, concerning seamen's legislation pending before your committee.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

AMERICAN STEAMSHIP ASSOCIATION,
New York, N. Y., May 19, 1913.

Hon. W. C. REDFIELD,

Secretary of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Just before the close of the last session of Congress hearings extending over a period of about four weeks were given by the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate on a bill which had passed the lower House (H. R. 23673), commonly designated the Wilson bill. Exhaustive testimony was submitted by representatives of the seamen's union and of the steamship owners. The committee did not agree on the Wilson bill, but reported a bill, known as the Burton bill, embodying many of the features of the Wilson bill, but eliminating its most unreasonable clauses, which passed the Senate and was finally concurred in by the House. This bill was, however, vetoed by President Taft, the reason assigned being that it had reached him only the day before his term expired and he did not have opportunity to give it due consideration.

At the present session of Congress Senator LA FOLLETTE has introduced into the Senate bill S. 4, which is almost identical with the Wilson bill, while Senator NELSON has introduced bill S. 136, the counterpart of the Burton bill which the President vetoed, and my information is that strong efforts are being made to have the Senate Committee on Commerce report the La Follette bill favorably to the Senate, coupled with assurances that if this is done the House will concur in it and the President sign it.

While the Burton bill, or, as it is now called, the Nelson bill, will entail hardships on our steamship interests, it does not contain the most vicious feature of the Wilson bill or the La Follette bill, viz, the section requiring that every vessel of the United States must have in her complement of deck crew, exclusive of her licensed officers, 65 per cent "able seamen" of three years' experience on the ocean or the Great Lakes, which in the latter case would be equivalent to four and a half years, since navigation on the Great Lakes is closed for four months of each year.

The designation "able seamen" belongs to the days of the sailing ship, before the advent of the steamer. The sailing ship is fast disappearing as a factor in sea transportation, and with the opening of the Panama Canal will become less so, if we may consider the effects of the opening of the Suez Canal as a criterion. The work performed by the deck hands aboard a modern steamer, with her short masts, little rigging, and almost no sails, is of the most ordinary kind of unskilled labor that can be imagined, consisting for the most part of washing decks, scrubbing paint, and polishing brasswork, the center of gravity, so to speak, having shifted from the deck to the engine department, where the really technical part of a steamer's work is now performed. Even on the deck most of the heavy work is to-day operated by machinery controlled by the engine-room forces. To insist that it requires three years' experience to acquire facility to perform such simple duties is absurd, the general opinion of practical steamship officers being that three months at most would be amply sufficient.

It needs no argument to demonstrate, it is self-evident, that the preparation necessary to become a qualified member of the engine-room force of a modern steamer should be immeasurably longer than that required for the simple duties of a deck hand, yet the law requires but three years' preliminary service in the engine room to qualify as a licensed engineer officer and the same period for a deck officer. Not only so, but a preliminary service of about six months or a year is generally considered sufficient to equip a young man of ordinary intelligence to competently perform the duties of a junior engineer, and certainly not longer to qualify as a fireman.

More three years' service of itself would be no indication of capacity, and the latter alone should be considered in the selection of crews for any position in all departments of a ship, but the requirements of this bill merely call for three years' service and provide for no test of skill before a Government certificate is issued. The men best fitted to fill the exceptional duties in the deck department of a modern steamer are those brought up around the rivers and harbors abounding on our enormous extent of seaboard, and in such bays as the Chesapeake and its tributaries, where they are accustomed to handle small boats of all descriptions from youth; yet by the terms of this bill these young men are prohibited from qualifying as able seamen. The experience acquired by a young American raised on the rivers, creeks, and bays of such a State as Maine, and even in the fisheries, would not avail him if he desired to devote himself to the seafaring calling. Furthermore, no young man with any self-respect would desire to enter an occupation which required him to submit to a three years' apprenticeship (which this really amounts to) to qualify for duties which can be acquired in as many months. To do so would be tantamount to admitting incapacity; rather, it would have the effect of repelling the very kind of young men we would all gladly see attracted to the profession from which to recruit our officers. The American has the reputation all over the world, and deservedly so, for his adaptability, but should any such provision as this become enacted it would be a serious contradiction to this commendable tribute to our national capacity.

It is an admitted fact that most young men do not remain at sea for a lengthy period, either in the merchant service or in the Navy, the exceptions being among those who aspire to become officers. After a few years at most, and in many cases less than a year, when the romance and glamor of the sea has relinquished its hold over them, they seek more congenial employment ashore, or some kind of marine occupation which will permit them to be more frequently at home. This depletes the number of those from whom we could recruit the 65 per cent of certificated seamen to such an extent that it would be an utter impossibility to comply with the law even in some of the larger ports of the country. The available men would naturally concentrate in the largest ports, where opportunities were greatest, and few of them would be found at the smaller ports. The effect of this would be that should one or more of these certificated men take sick or desert a ship, or should a whole crew leave a ship for any reason at such ports as, say, Norfolk, Va., Charleston, S. C., Savannah, Ga., Jacksonville, Fla., New Orleans, La., Galveston, Tex., or at any of the ports on the Pacific coast, save, perhaps, San Francisco, there would be no means of replacing them until the owner had sent to the larger ports and had certificated men brought to the lesser port, nor could the ship leave until this had been done. The embarrassment resulting from such a state of affairs can be imagined should this occur just immediately prior to the ship's scheduled hour of departure, when she would have a large number of passengers aboard and probably a highly perishable cargo.

I submit these objections to the La Follette bill for your consideration, feeling assured that you will give them the thought that they merit.

Very truly, yours,

H. H. RAYMOND, President.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 18, 1913.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
Chairman Senate Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as this bill is most technical in some features and its effect likely to be misunderstood by many who are not familiar with navigation, I venture to submit to you a brief memorandum of what appears to be the real purpose of the measure and why there is such a marked difference between the bill as advocated by the representative of the seamen and the shipowners.

It should be clearly understood that a large part of this measure is already existing law and that the bill only reenacts, with some slight changes, a number of sections of the Revised Statutes which are already in force. It should not, therefore, be assumed for a moment that the shipowners are opposed to the legislation proposed in many of the provisions of the several bills pending, because it was fully brought out at the hearings in both the Senate and House committees that the differences relate to but few features of the bill, but that those differences are quite marked, and we believe the opinions expressed by us are in the interest of safety at sea.

Briefly stated, this bill provides as to new legislation the number of hours beyond which no seaman shall be required to work unless he is paid overtime therefor, and while this feature will work a severe hardship on some of the lines, it was clearly established at the hearings that this was not the most objectionable feature contained in the proposed legislation.

Great stress has been laid upon the seaman being permitted to leave his employment without fear of arrest or imprisonment—and this notwithstanding the fact that the owner of a vessel is bound by contract to fulfill all the terms thereof while the sailor is to be given the right to abandon his agreement without question—but if it is the wisdom of Congress that such a provision should be enacted into law, it seems quite evident from the hearings that the shipowners were not entering a great protest thereto, nor has there been any serious differences of opinion as to the right of the sailor to demand his wages when leaving the employ of the steamer.

While there was some discussion over the subject of increased space for quarters and washing outfits, it was clearly established to the committee that there could be no objection to any reasonable requirement where it was mechanically possible to install the apparatus, and the committee in framing the legislation that has been proposed has dealt with this subject in a manner which seems entirely agreeable to the seamen and which also is considered as fair by the shipowner. Some of the objections which had originally been raised to this feature of the law were based upon such things as a requirement that hot and cold water should be furnished on all types of vessels, because a literal construction of the language would have been impossible of compliance with on some sailing craft where hot water was not obtainable. Proper explanation of all of these details clearly satisfied the committee that owners of vessels were acting in good faith, as was evidenced by the result being agreeable to both sides of the controversy.

No shipowner can be found who is willing to say that legislation amending or extending the laws that will protect a sailor from being defrauded by a boarding-house keeper or some other unscrupulous person should not be enacted, and anything that may have been said before the committee was not based upon an objection to that sort of legislation, but was in connection with the results that all of these provisions will obtain.

The greatest difference that arose during the discussion before your committee was in connection with that section which provides for the manning of lifeboats, and the shipowners are prepared to submit to the unbiased mind for decision whether the employment of so-called "able seamen" will insure safety to the traveling public. We have contended, and we believe from long experience rightfully so, that length of service at sea does not qualify a man to handle a lifeboat. There are many instances of persons who have served on deck at sea on various vessels for years who are not experienced in handling small boats; and as the object of the legislation sought to be enacted is to better protect human life at sea, it seems it should make no great difference as to whether a man is called an "able seaman," a "skilled lifeboat man," or a "life guard," so long as he is qualified to perform that particular service which is expected of him during the hour of disaster or need for his service.

The shipowner has suggested that it would be wise for Congress to provide as a requirement to protect human life that no vessel should depart from a port of the United States unless she had in her crew not less than two skilled persons for each lifeboat carried, and that such persons should be required to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the local inspectors, under rules to be prescribed by the Department of Commerce, that they are capable of swinging out, lowering, detaching from boat falls, experienced in the use of oars, and understand the proper manner of placing persons in such lifeboats. In other words, the shipowner asks that the service to be performed by the men who are to handle the boats shall be specifically set forth, so that there can be no doubt of their ability to meet an emergency when it arises. Certainly because the shipowner is aware of the fact that the "able seaman" of to-day is not the "able seaman" of the day of the sailing ship and does not possess the skill that the name would imply and recommends a specific requirement in lieu thereof is no justification for claiming the shipowner is endeavoring to underman a vessel or provide unskilled employees.

The modern steamer of to-day is so mechanical in all of its performance that there is little left for the sailor to do on deck outside of that which could be performed by any able-bodied person, except in so far as the handling of lifeboats is concerned. If that is conceded, then it matters little whether a lifeboat is manned by a person called an "able seaman" or by some one else possessed of the requisite skill and called a life guard or a lifeboat man.

The mere provision that three years' experience at sea on deck shall be required to qualify a person to become an "able seaman" does not carry with it any guaranty of safety to the public, because the work performed by the deck men aboard a modern steamer, with her short masts, little rigging, and almost no sails, is of the most ordinary kind of unskilled labor that can be imagined, consisting for the most part of scrubbing paint and polishing brass work. The center of gravity, so to speak, has been shifted from the deck to the engine department, where the really technical part of a steamer's work is now performed. Even on the deck most of the heavy work is to-day operated by machinery controlled by the engine-room forces. Therefore to insist that it requires three years' experience to acquire the ability to perform such simple duties is absurd.

No other nation in the world, with the exception of Australia, has ever attempted to prescribe, either by legislation or departmental regulations, that seamen shall be certificated or that any percentage of a ship's deck crew shall have a specified period of sea service, not even in the day when the sailing ship was the sole ocean carrier and when the work required of a seaman was complicated and technical.

It needs no argument to demonstrate that the preparation necessary to become a qualified member of the engine-room force of a modern steamer should be longer than that required for duty on deck—speaking specifically of the actual deck duties. Yet the law to-day demands but three years' preliminary service in the engine room to qualify as a licensed engineer. Not only so, but a preliminary service of about six months or a year is generally considered sufficient to equip a young man of ordinary intelligence to competently perform the duties of junior engineer, and certainly not longer to qualify as a fireman.

More three years' service of itself would be no indication of capacity. Capacity alone and not length of service should be considered in the selection of crews for any position in all departments of a ship, but the requirements of the bill proposed originally by the seamen merely provides for three years' experience at sea or on the Great Lakes shall be had as a prerequisite to obtain a certificate of "able seamanship."

The men who are to-day best fitted to fulfill the exceptional duties in the deck department of a modern steamer are those brought up around the rivers and harbors on our seaboard and in such bays as the Chesapeake and its tributaries, where they are accustomed to handle small boats of all kinds from boyhood; yet by the terms of the bill proposed by the seamen the best of these men would be prohibited from qualifying as "able seamen." Therefore we contend that length of service at sea is no guaranty of efficiency, and that the provision set forth in the bill (S. 136) as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Commerce providing for two skilled lifeboat hands for each lifeboat carried, and specifying definitely the qualifications which they shall possess before they shall be entitled to be so rated, is striking at the very root of the thing and accomplishing the real purpose that should be in the heart of all who are seeking to safeguard life at sea and which has never met with objection from owners of vessels.

The opposition upon the part of the seamen to legislation so fairly drawn as that contained in the bill as reported to the Senate can not be understood, unless it is based upon some selfish purpose, and no such purpose should be given consideration by Congress in a matter of so great importance as that dealing with the protection of human life.

It can be conceived that the original bill presented by the seamen has a purpose in mind which is not altogether in the interest of safety, i. e., that of taking the manning of vessels entirely out of the hands of the Government and placing the same in the hands of the seamen themselves. The question might be asked, How can this be effected? The answer is clear:

By abolishing the present laws, in so far as they bring about alleged "involuntary servitude," by which right is lodged with the master of a vessel to require a seaman to perform service after signing an agreement to do so, the sailor is privileged to leave his employment without fear of being compelled to perform his contract. This is the first stage by which the seaman is allowed to effect the arrangement by which the manning of vessels will be turned over to the seamen themselves. Next, the provision by which it is made a misdemeanor for anyone to issue an allotment note or to advance any seaman wages aids in bringing about a condition by which the sailor himself is deprived of being able to seek lodging any place but the place which may be chosen by a majority of the seamen themselves; because it can readily be understood that there could be many honest boarding-house and lodging-house keepers who might hesitate to grant credit to a sailor who may be here to-day and who may ship for some foreign port before he could possibly have funds with which to pay for his keep while seeking employment.

Driving the seamen in this way to one central point will undoubtedly have the effect of combinations among the men being formed and conditions being laid down which may not be conducive to safety at sea.

The writing into the statutes of a provision that no vessel shall sail from a port of the United States unless she shall carry "in her deck department" a fixed number of men called able seamen, simply because they make affidavit that they have had three years' experience at sea, is fraught with much danger. This provision provides the finishing touches to a grand opportunity for the men to absolutely dominate the situation and does not leave to the Government any rights whatsoever.

It should not be overlooked that the seamen may not be seeking so much the protection of human life as to give themselves a dominating position over the vessel owners. A careful study of the provisions of the bill proposed by the seamen (Senate bill No. 4) will show that it is most adroitly drawn and so cleverly woven together that to him who is not well posted as to maritime affairs some dangerous clauses look most reasonable.

Think of a bill being introduced into Congress to provide an extra ounce of butter and an extra quart of water per day. What seaman to-day would stand up and claim that he is denied all the butter and water he could use? But that is one of the provisions which is calculated to bring to the cause sympathy, and it is for no other purpose.

It seems that the real and only object of the bill proposed by the seamen is to secure, by legislative enactment, a dominating position which will enable them to dictate the terms and conditions under which and how they shall perform service. They can better accomplish this purpose by limiting the effective hands to the deck department. They appear to stubbornly object to men from other departments of the ship being counted upon for service in an emergency, undoubtedly because this would probably make the situation for their purpose more difficult of control.

Is it not better to have men available for lifeboat or other duty of emergency from all departments of the ship than to limit the effective men to the "deck department"? The case of the Volturno answers this question conclusively. In that case a large number of the men were in their bunks and were cut off from escape, thus depriving the vessel of their services. How many of these men belonged to the deck department can not be answered, but under the three-watch system there must have been the same number off deck duty as off duty from other departments. Consequently are you not inviting disaster by limiting your effective boat hands to the deck department? Only a selfish reason can produce an answer in the negative.

Candidly, does it not seem that this is a question where the public should be considered of first importance, and that the claims of both the shipowners and the seamen should be brushed aside as a secondary consideration? That being the case, does it not seem that a provision by which two skilled lifeboat men are to be provided for each lifeboat carried, and that no person can be rated as a skilled lifeboat man until he has demonstrated conclusively to the local inspector that he is capable of swinging out, lowering, detaching from boat falls, can properly use oars, and in every way is qualified to handle a ship's lifeboat, which provision goes to the very heart of the thing sought to be accomplished, is better than a provision that there shall be in the deck department two able seamen for each lifeboat carried?

In one instance you are specifically requiring a man to possess a knowledge of that particular duty which he is expected to perform, while in the other you are simply taking a chance on three years' service at sea qualifying him to perform such duties, to say nothing of the risk that might be involved through perjury in securing certificates of able seamanship.

It must be remembered that the bill proposed by the seamen distinctly states that "any person making affidavit that he has had three years' experience at sea on deck shall be given a certificate, and that such certificate shall be prima facie evidence of his qualification." Suppose some one should stoop to perjury to obtain such a certificate; is there any way to determine this fact? If one might do this, why might not hundreds?

By the adoption of the "able-seamen" provision proposed by the seamen this Government will come dangerously close to placing the manning of ships in the hands of persons other than the shipowners and Government officials. It will be opening a way by which some boarding-house keepers, saloon keepers, etc., along the harbor fronts will get possession of these certificates and may be automatically producing able seamen for a consideration. In fact, these certificates will find their way all over the world. They will change hands from time to time, and in the course of a short while a certificate will not be worth the paper on which it is written so far as insuring that the holder thereof has any special qualifications to render extraordinary service in time of disaster.

The provision which has been recommended for adoption in the Nelson bill certainly seems to be more deducive to safety of life aboard a passenger ship than the arbitrary method proposed in the bill suggested by the seamen, and there would be some opportunity for the young men who have spent their lives on our bays and harbors in handling small boats to demonstrate their efficiency for service on some of our seagoing vessels. Under the proposition proposed by the seamen it may make a closed shop of men who have been able to get the certificates, and will deny every chance to a capable man who is not in their circle from every securing legitimate employment on board a vessel. The query naturally arises, Why can not any experienced person get a certificate? The answer is plain. The seamen may find it rather easy within their own circles to obtain these certificates, because there will be no one to challenge the truth or veracity of their statements as to the length of sea service they have had. But consider the man who is not within the circle, but who has had a number of years' experience at sea and applies for a certificate. The seamen will undoubtedly make it a point to learn to whom such certificates are issued, and will challenge the statements of everyone who is not within their circle, thus practically making it impossible for an unattached individual from ever obtaining a certificate of seamanship unless he is willing to abide by the terms and conditions that may be laid down by the seamen. A careful consideration of this phase of the case will so fully unfold the dangers that further argument seems unnecessary.

In conclusion, it can be stated without fear of contradiction that the bill proposed by the seamen is not designed nor would it work for the safety of human life at sea. If they were seeking safety, they would not refer to the Nelson bill as a makeshift and utterly unsuitable to accomplish the results which the public should expect. The truth is the Nelson bill is 95 per cent the same, word for word, as the bill which passed the House last session. The only difference, which seems vital to the seamen, is that provision relating to "able seamen," and the reason they make such a vital point of this is not that it will not protect human life to the fullest extent, but that it will not make possible the carrying out of plans to put into their own hands the manning of vessels and to absolutely take this away from Government supervising. That is all there is to the question, and it does not seem that Congress should give much consideration to a proposition where the seamen would simply get an advantage over the vessel owner, or vice versa, when the subject of human life is at stake.

Put the seamen in a position to dominate the manning and operation of a vessel and you will absolutely destroy discipline. Without discipline there can be no safety. The ship owners ask that whatever is done shall be done under the eye of our trained Steamboat-Inspection Service, and that those officials shall be left some say as to how our vessels shall be manned and operated.

The whole bill is so important in its scope and is so put together to accomplish a purpose which we are sure Congress would not favor if the matter were fully understood that your most careful consideration of the entire subject is invited before the bill that is proposed to displace that of the committee is enacted into law.

Respectfully, yours,

EDWIN H. DUFF,
Attorney American Steamship Association.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 8702. An act to authorize the county of Miami, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Wabash River in Miami County, Ind., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to provide for furnishing the additional rooms in the House Office Building was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONGRESS HALL CELEBRATION IN PHILADELPHIA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 134) for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I most respectfully ask that unanimous consent may be given for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. I have a draft of a joint resolution similar in purport to that which I proposed to introduce, but since this joint resolution has come from the House I will not pursue that course.

I trust that this most patriotic step will be taken. It involves no expense to the Government, but simply authorizes the President to appoint one Senator and one Member of the House representing each of the original thirteen States to participate in the ceremonies and celebration in turning Congress Hall over to the city of Philadelphia. The city has provided for the celebration and will bear the entire expense. At the end of the joint resolution there is a clause wherein it declares that there shall be no expense incurred by the United States.

Mr. President, I am very much in favor of all measures that may tend to preserve the too few historic buildings and places we have in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not hear what is the joint resolution. May I ask that it be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas Congress Hall, Philadelphia, has been recently restored to the condition in which it existed when used by the Continental Congress and the Congress of the United States at Philadelphia; and Whereas the citizens of Philadelphia have arranged for a fitting celebration to be held upon the turning over of the building by the committee in charge of the work of restoration; and

Whereas the city of Philadelphia has extended an invitation to the Congress of the United States to have a representation of the Senate and House at the ceremonies: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint 13 Members, one from each of the 13 original States, to represent the Senate; and that the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint from the membership of the House such number of Members as may be requested by the city of Philadelphia; and that the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House so appointed shall constitute a joint committee on behalf of the Congress of the United States to attend the above celebration: Provided, That the attendance of the committee shall entail no expense on the Government of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask if there is any indication in the resolution as to the date of the visit to the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On the 25th of October—a week from to-day.

Mr. BURTON. And for one day?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, being desirous of appointing as nearly as possible Senators who are in the city to attend the celebration at Congress Hall, in Philadelphia, makes the following appointments:

From the State of New Hampshire, Mr. HOLLIS; from the State of Massachusetts, Mr. WEEKS; from the State of Connecticut, Mr. BRANDEGEE; from the State of Rhode Island, Mr. COLT; from the State of New York, Mr. O'GORMAN; from the State of New Jersey, Mr. MARTINE; from the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE; from the State of Delaware, Mr. DU PONT; from the State of Maryland, Mr. SMITH; from the State of Virginia, Mr. MARTIN; from the State of North Carolina, Mr. OVERMAN; from the State of South Carolina, Mr. TILMAN; and from the State of Georgia, Mr. BACON.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 35, Senate bill 834, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors, and so forth. The reason why I make the request is that all the other omnibus pension bills have been passed by the Senate and are in the House. I ask that this bill be passed now, so that all the pension bills can be considered at once by the House committee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 834) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 13, line 23, after the words "per month," to insert "in lieu of that he is now receiving," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Judson P. Adams, late of Company F, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 14, to insert:

The name of John A. Barnhouse, late of Company F, Ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 18, to insert:

The name of Horace A. Hitchcock, late of Company C, Forty-eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 22, to insert:

The name of Benjamin F. Jay, late of Company A, Forty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 2, to insert:

The name of Nathaniel J. Smith, late of Company L, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 136.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States, to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto, and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, so far as I have been able to ascertain there is no Senator prepared to speak to-day upon the bill which is the order of business. I myself had expected to address the Senate to-day, but being somewhat indisposed I prefer to wait until the next legislative session of the Senate. If no other Senator is ready to go on to-day, I suggest to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that if an executive session is desired it might be had at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before an executive session is had I ask permission, when the other bill is laid aside, if it is laid aside, to bring up Order of Business 93, being Senate bill 192, for further consideration. If the Senate does not go into executive session, we can take up that bill. It is the bill to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection to taking up any bill within the morning hour, provided it works no impairment of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has the understanding, and so rules, that Senate bill 136 will be the regular order of business at the conclusion of morning business at the next session of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that there has been a request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? In order that the bill may hold its place, such a request should be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not make that request, because the bill does not come up at this time as the unfinished business. It would come up as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, as I understand. It comes up now, if it comes up at all, under the order made by the Senate. If, having been laid before the Senate under that order, it can be laid aside to take up any other measure before 2 o'clock without working any infringement upon the unanimous-consent agreement, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether the Chair will be overruled or not; but the Chair will at least hold that Senate bill 136 has at present the right of way in the Senate, and that if it be temporarily laid aside it does not thereby lose the precedence which it will have at the next session of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understand it, and that is why I suggested that the bill be temporarily laid aside, because I think that then the bill will remain in the same position as it is to-day; but if other business were taken up without laying it temporarily aside, I am of the opinion that it would displace it as the unfinished business. I think the Chair is perfectly right in his ruling.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that understanding, I will ask to have the bill temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection to laying the bill temporarily aside, but I should like to ask until what day it is intended to adjourn the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Until Monday.

Mr. BURTON. I would suggest that the adjournment should be not later than Monday, for which I am not certain how long the debate will be on this measure it is desirable that there should be plenty of time for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite agree with the Senator from Ohio that there should be ample time for debate, and, so far as my own relation to the bill is concerned, I will say that from the session on Monday I shall urge the Senate to consider the bill continuously until it is passed or the limitation of the order is exhausted.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, with his permission, that there is some executive business which will not occupy a very great time, and that if an executive session were held we could very readily return to legislative session immediately thereafter. There are some Senators who are anxious about certain matters which should be disposed of in executive session.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, Mr. President, if an understanding could be had that we resume legislative session, I should have no objection, of course, to an executive session.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt that that will be done.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well. Then I will not at present make the motion which I intended to make.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

FREE AND EFFICIENT SEAMEN.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I find that House Report No. 645, Sixty-second Congress, second session, submitted by Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to accompany House bill 23673, is exhausted. As it bears upon the bill which has been made the special order, and as there has been something of a call for copies of the report, I ask for the adoption of the following order.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 copies of House Report No. 645, Sixty-second Congress, second session, relative to free and efficient seamen, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 192) to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 20, after the word "committee," strike out the words "properly reported as," and in the same line, after the words "required by law," to insert "to report; but the members of the committee shall be responsible and penalized as herein provided if the contribution be not reported as required by law," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to the payment of bills incurred by a national or State campaign committee in the fitting out and maintenance of speaking campaigns by a candidate for the office of President or Vice President where a train is fitted out and maintained by the national or State committee; nor shall it include the actual expenses of speakers sent out by a national or State committee, the expenses of literature distributed by a national committee, advertisements marked as such paid for by a national committee, or campaign funds raised for and sent to a national committee required by law to report; but the members of the committee shall be responsible and penalized as herein provided if the contribution be not reported as required by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the amendments which I suggested when the bill was under consideration before were adopted?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir; they were.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, October 20, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate October 18, 1913.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

Joseph A. Maynard, of Massachusetts, to be surveyor of customs in the district of Massachusetts, in place of Edward G. Graves, resigned.

NAVAL OFFICER OF CUSTOMS.

John B. Nash, of New Hampshire, to be naval officer of customs in the district of Massachusetts, in place of James O. Lyford, resigned.

ASSISTANT APPRAISER OF MERCHANDISE.

Francis X. Quigley, of Massachusetts, to be assistant appraiser of merchandise in the district of Massachusetts, in place of Rufus A. Flanders, superseded.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

John F. Malley, of Massachusetts, to be collector of internal revenue for the third district of Massachusetts, in place of James D. Gill, resigned.

PROMOTION IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Second Lieut. Muller Stuntz Hay to be a first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to rank as such from July 19, 1913, in place of First Lieut. Harry Gabriel Hamlet, promoted.

SOLICITOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

SENATE.

Monday, October 20, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 767. An act granting permission to the city of Marshfield, Oreg., to close Mill Slough, in said city; and

S. 3296. An act to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office.

COTTON BAGGING AND TIES (S. DOC. NO. 213).

Mr. SMOOT. I move to reconsider the vote authorizing the printing of the communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting reports prepared in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, on the recent advance in the price of bagging used in baling cotton, and so forth.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that an order be entered authorizing the printing of the communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting reports prepared in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, on the recent advance in the price of bagging used in baling cotton, and also the advance in the price of ties used in handling or baling cotton be printed with the accompanying papers and illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LIEUT. WILLIAM S. COX, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Minnesota Historical Society, praying that the petition of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, requesting an appropriation for the erection of a monument to Lieut. William S. Cox, United States Navy, be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RURAL CREDITS AND AGRICULTURAL FINANCE (S. DOC. NO. 214).

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report a resolution which I ask unanimous consent may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 195), as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed as a public document the evidence secured by the American commission in cooperation with the United States commission on their inquiry into the agricultural credit and cooperative systems of European countries made between April 26 and July 26, 1913, including special reports of subcommittees, statements and addresses pertaining to the subjects submitted to the commissions, or either of them, all printed matter prepared for the commissions, or either of them, a bibliography of any literature used as material for the reports of said commissions, translations of laws and statutes under which the various institutions studied operate in the different countries, translations of constitutions, by-laws, rules and regulations, and business forms of institutions investigated, special statistical data showing the extent to which each system or set of institutions is found to exist in each country, and other material bearing on the work of the commissions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida requests unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I was not in the Chamber when the Secretary began to read the resolution. I should like to have it read again, and I should like also to ask whether the resolution comes from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does. I will state to the Senator that it is a resolution which the committee adopted some time ago. He doubtless can recall that we had the matter before the committee, and they authorized a favorable report on this resolution. It has taken some time to compile the data and get it in shape for the printer. I have just presented the report of the committee, though we acted on it some weeks ago. The resolution was before the committee, and we discussed it there.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand that the resolution simply proposes to make a public document of the data and the papers that have been collected by the commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; the data and the evidence.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator any idea as to the size of the publication?

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not state precisely as to the size, but I think it will all be included in one volume somewhat smaller than the volume I hold in my hand. I can not state exactly what the size will be, but the matter ought to be comprised in one volume. It will embrace all the evidence gathered by the two commissions in European countries bearing on the great question of rural credits and agricultural finance.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator whether it will be a reprint of a great many of the documents that have already been published?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; what has taken some time is to eliminate matter in order to get it into as small a compass as possible. We have endeavored not to duplicate what has been heretofore furnished on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator an estimate from the Public Printer of the cost?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not an estimate of the cost, because it has been impossible to get at what precisely the cost will be. Until we had eliminated the matter that would have been a duplication we were not able to tell how much would be included in the volume.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to object to anything which the committee has passed upon, but I know there has been a great deal of printing on this subject, and I really did not know but that there would be a duplication of matter heretofore printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I assure the Senator there will not be any duplication. It is new matter, gathered last summer by these commissions, and I think it is very important data.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PAGE (for Mr. BURLEIGH):

A bill (S. 3304) granting a pension to Sarah F. Robinson; and

A bill (S. 3305) granting an increase of pension to William R. Downs; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3306) to provide for the erection of a public building at Memphis, State of Texas; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3307) for the relief of F. J. Fearis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 3308) granting a pension to Hannah A. Thompson;

A bill (S. 3309) granting a pension to Ada S. Goodrell;

A bill (S. 3310) granting an increase of pension to Donald C. Glasgow;

A bill (S. 3311) granting an increase of pension to Alfred D. Collier; and

A bill (S. 3312) granting an increase of pension to William F. Graham; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3313) to amend paragraph 8, section 24, chapter 2, of the Judicial Code; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FIRE PROTECTION AT SEA.

Mr. WEEKS. I introduce a joint resolution which I should like to have read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) to provide for an investigation into the best methods of construction of vessels for safety, particularly with reference to fire protection, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) to provide for an investigation into the best methods of construction of vessels for safety, particularly with reference to fire protection.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby empowered to appoint a commission of three competent men whose duty it shall be to make a thorough investigation into the best methods of constructing vessels for safety, especially those engaged in passenger transportation, particularly with reference to fire protection, structural construction of hulls and bulkheads, and the character of materials used in the construction and finish of such vessels. The commission is hereby authorized to visit any ports of the United States and, if necessary, foreign ports; to issue subpoenas for and compel the attendance of witnesses within the United States; to examine them, and to require the production of books, papers, designs, drawings, documents, and other evidence. Each member of the commission shall be paid his necessary expenses, and each member, other than any in the service of the United States, shall be paid in addition compensation at the rate of $20 per diem for each day while actually engaged in the work of the commission and going to or returning from such work: Provided, That the entire expenses of the commission shall not exceed the sum of $20,000. The said commission shall report, through the President, to Congress its findings and recommendations, together with an itemized statement of all its expenditures, not later than March 1, 1914.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, but I should like to have it referred to the Committee on Commerce. I hope the London conference next month will take up this and kindred questions, and furnish us the basis for legislation that will protect the passengers and crews, especially on passenger steamers. But the subject is one of so much importance that I have introduced the joint resolution now, and unless the London conference takes suitable action I shall press for a report upon it as soon as that conference has completed its deliberations.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will state that a committee or committees have already been chosen to consider these subjects. The letter of Secretary Redfield of April 10, 1913, states the action of the Department of Commerce on this subject. Speaking of the large number of passengers that cross the Atlantic annually and the dangers by sea, he states:

I wish to organize a committee on which shall be represented the American Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers, the American Society of Naval Engineers, and the technical schools which offer instruction in naval architecture and marine engineering, such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the University of Michigan, the Leland Stanford Junior University, Cornell University, and the Stevens Institute of Technology. I have also requested the principal shipbuilding companies which build ocean passenger steamers to suggest to me names of those most competent to express the views of shipbuilders on this subject. The American passenger-ship owners on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, respectively, have been asked to name those most competent to express their views, and I have also invited Mr. William Livingstone, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, to suggest a name that will carry authority throughout the marine interests of the Great Lakes. The American Record of Shipping, generally known as "American Lloyds," has also been invited to participate, and I have also designated Mr. J. Bernard Walker, editor of the Scientific American, with whose instructive work, An Unsinkable Titanic, you are doubtless acquainted. To this committee I have asked the Secretary of the Navy to add an officer of the Construction Corps of that department, for although the hulls of battleships and ocean passenger steamships are designed to meet quite different conditions, I wish to avail myself of the high technical knowledge and standing of the members of this corps. Of course, the Steamboat-Inspection Service of the Department of Commerce will be represented. Suggestions will be welcomed from other sources, for the above list is not meant to be exclusive.

Also a committee has been chosen made up of experts from several of the different departments. It is my impression that they have already made a preliminary report. Also the delegation chosen to attend the London conference has made a preliminary statement of what should be done, giving certain suggestions in this matter.

In this connection I wish to say that we very much understate the pains taken by officials and by others, including ship-owners, seamen, and officers, to provide for safety at sea. In some remarks which I expect to make on the seamen's bill I shall set forth the legislation and conventions of recent years in that regard; and this has reached its climax in the proposed conference to be held at London, beginning on the 12th of next month, at which the best experts of the leading maritime nations will be represented.

At the same time I commend the general object of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, and if no satisfactory report or conclusion should be reached from the conference at London there would then be occasion for adopting this joint resolution.

Also it lays special stress on danger from fire, a danger emphasized by the recent Volturno disaster. It may be said in this connection that each marine disaster has distinctive features of its own. The steps that are taken after one calamity meet the dangers which arise from that calamity or its causes, but the next disaster is almost invariably due to different conditions altogether.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THOMAS B. STALLINGS AND RICHARD M. NELSON.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 196), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to place upon the rolls of the Senate as clerk and as messenger, respectively, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, from the date of the adoption of this resolution, the names of Thomas B. Stallings and Richard M. Nelson, such appointments to hold until the election of a chairman of said committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 197), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Thomas B. Stallings the sum of $2,220 per annum and to Richard M. Nelson the sum of $1,200 per annum, the same being for services as clerk and as messenger to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, respectively, from August 16, 1913, to the date of the passage of this resolution.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside for the present that I may make a motion to take from the table Senate resolution 94, which was brought up on the 29th and 30th of May last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there consent to temporarily laying aside the regular order? The Chair hears no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire a few moments to make a brief statement of a somewhat personal nature. I shall not occupy very much time. I will ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Special to the World.]

WASHINGTON, October 13.

Senator STONE announced to-day that he will address the Senate next Wednesday on the necessity of passing the currency bill at this session of Congress.

It is generally understood that he will act as a direct spokesman of President Wilson when he urges his colleagues to put aside their differences and unite on the bill.

Senator STONE'S speech is calculated to "smoke out" and put on public record Senator O'GORMAN, of New York, Senator REED, of Missouri, and Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, the three Democrats whose tactics are delaying action on the bill.

Senator STONE is expected to direct much of his fire against Senator O'GORMAN, with whom he had an altercation on the subject the other day.

The speech to be made by Senator STONE is expected to be the beginning of an active fight for the passage of the bill at this session, and other Democratic Senators are understood to be preparing to demand that the party get together and dispose of the legislation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on Saturday last I gave formal notice that on Wednesday of this week, if the Senate should then be in session, or, if not, then at an early day thereafter, I would ask the attention of the Senate in submitting some remarks on the banking and currency bill, now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, and that I would direct my remarks especially to the importance of taking action on that bill and disposing of it at this session of Congress. That is all I said at that time. This dispatch appeared yesterday morning in one of the great papers of New York, one of the great papers of this country and of the world. The statements in the dispatch are erroneous, and, I fear, are calculated to be mischievous in effect. I had no conversation whatever with any correspondent or with anyone after I gave this notice as to what I intended to say, and the author of this dispatch simply drew upon his imagination. He certainly had not any "tip" from me as to what I had in mind to say. It is said in the dispatch:

It is generally understood that he will act as a direct spokesman of President Wilson when he urges his colleagues to put aside their differences and unite on the bill.

That is a mistake. I have no authority to speak for the President; I have not been designated in any form whatever to speak for him. Whatever I may say when the time comes will be what I have to say on my own account and responsibility. I shall hope and I believe that in the main what I may say will have the approval of the President, if I correctly understand his position on this subject. I have no hesitancy in saying here now, so far as I understand the President's attitude. I am in sympathy with it. Quoting again from this dispatch:

Senator STONE'S speech is calculated to "smoke out" and put on public record Senator O'GORMAN, of New York, Senator REED, of Missouri, and Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, the three Democrats whose tactics are delaying action on the bill.

Mr. President, that is the particular thing in this dispatch to which I object. I have no idea of "smoking out" anybody. There is no one nor anything to be "smoked out." The Senators named are men of force and character; they have opinions of their own, and they have the courage of their opinions, as I have the courage of mine. I have had no thought of saying anything that could by any strained construction be offensive—quite the contrary. "Smoking out" is an offensive term that I do not like, and if I were to attempt anything along that line, Mr. President, it would defeat or tend to defeat the very thing I am anxious to accomplish—that is, speedy action on this bill. I do not wish to offend any Senator unnecessarily, but I do intend, when the time comes, to speak my own views without equivocation, hesitation, or doubt as to my meaning. I would not hesitate to appeal to members of the Banking and Currency Committee of both parties, especially of my own party, for speedy action, and not to the committee alone but to the whole Senate, for early action on this bill; and not alone to Senators on this side, but to Senators on both sides of the Chamber. Mr. President, I do not wish to be put in the attitude of contemplating an attack on anybody. I have no thought of that kind.

And right here I wish to speak particularly with regard to my colleague, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I know—and I wish to put this on record now—that Senator REED is as desirous of the enactment, and the speedy enactment, of banking and currency legislation as any other Senator here, and I think I know his feeling. He has believed that he ought to take a reasonable time to investigate facts relating to this important legislation, and I think that any criticism of his conduct or that of other members of the committee in this behalf ought to wait awhile, at least until we know there is real cause for criticism. I know my colleague so well that no question can arise in my mind of his high purpose to do his utmost faithfully to serve the public welfare.

I indulge the hope and the belief that this honorable committee will dispose of the questions before them in time to bring this bill before the Senate at a very early day, so that it may be considered at this session, and so that reasonable opportunity may be given at this session to pass upon the bill; and for one I am sure that my colleague is in sympathy with that policy, and I hope that the other members of the committee—all the members of the committee—feel likewise, whether they represent one political party or another.

Mr. President, at this time I wish merely to urge considerately and kindly that the members of the committee take as speedy action as possible, and this I do with the belief—certainly with the hope—that there will be no occasion for criticism on account of undue delay.

Mr. President, I have heard some talk about the party aspect of this question. Just a word as to that. For myself I will say that I think it would be better if legislation of this importance, or if any other important legislation, could go to the country with the approval of a large number of Senators and Representatives belonging to the different parties. I think legislation so enacted would more likely immediately challenge the general confidence. I would love to see this bill passed in that way; but I wish also to make this plain—that however gratified I would be to have this legislation approved by Senators on both sides, yet the Democratic Party is the party primarily responsible for this legislation. There is really no more reason, as I see it, why banking and currency legislation should not be made the subject of party action, if that should be necessary, than that tariff legislation should be made the subject of party action—not a whit more reason why. I am still indulging the hope and the belief that it will not be necessary to put this business in that attitude, but, if it should become necessary, for one, I think the party that is responsible for legislation and for the conduct of the Government should assume the full measure of that responsibility, and not shrink from it.

Mr. President, I see again it is stated in this newspaper article that I am to make some attack on the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I have had no thought of doing that; it never entered my mind. The Senator from New York can take care of himself and I leave his course to his own judgment.

The dispatch also says that the speech which I am to make "is expected to be the beginning of an active fight for the passage of the bill at this session, and other Democratic Senators are" going to take part in a movement of that kind. Well, I do not know as to that, but I do know, and I have no hesitancy in saying, that Senators on this side, so far as I have had any conferences with them, are growing impatient to take up this legislation; they are very anxious to take it up and dispose of it; and still we are all moving along here with the utmost patience expecting the members of the committee to complete their work in a very few days and bring the bill before the Senate. I am not now going to discuss why I think that that should be done. That might lead to some premature controversy with some members of the committee, and I am not seeking controversy—at least not at this time. I merely want to disabuse the minds of Senators, especially those who have been named in this dispatch, of any intention or purpose of mine to make any attack upon them.

That is all I care now to say.

POSTMASTER AT SALEM, OHIO.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 94 be taken from the table, and that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has just been trying to find out what is the practice in such cases. On consulting the Record the Chair finds that on the 2d day of June, by a ye-and-nay vote, the resolution was tabled. The Chair is of the opinion that, where a matter has upon a ye-and-nay vote been laid on the table, a Senator can not call it up for consideration. There must be a motion to take it from the table and to consider it. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand the Chair to rule that this resolution is definitely disposed of and that no other action can be taken upon it but a motion to take it from the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that was not the ruling of the Chair. The request was to take from the table and consider a resolution which by a ye-and-nay vote has been laid on the table. The ruling of the Chair was that it would require a motion to take it from the table; and that motion must be submitted to the Senate without argument.

Mr. BURTON. I take it that that is true of a motion of this kind, that it should be submitted without argument. I make the motion that the resolution be taken from the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that Senate resolution 94, laid on the table on the 2d day of June, be now taken from the table and considered by the Senate.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the resolution referred to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution requesting the Postmaster General to transmit to the Senate all papers relating to the appointment of a postmaster at Salem, Ohio.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, my attention has been diverted. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I should be glad if the Chair would repeat the suggestion which has been made by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the 2d day of June, by a ye-and-nay vote, Senate resolution 94, requesting the Postmaster General to transmit to the Senate all papers relating to the appointment of a postmaster at Salem, Ohio, was laid on the table. The Chair has ruled that it requires a motion now to take from the table the resolution and to consider it, and that that motion is not debatable. A motion is made to take the resolution from the table and now consider it.

Mr. BACON. I think the Chair is eminently correct in that ruling. I will make two criticisms, though, with regard to the resolution. In the first place, it is not in the language usually used by the Senate in directing a communication of that kind to the head of a department. In the second place, it should not be considered in open session, because it relates to executive business. If the Senator insists upon its consideration, I shall move that the doors be closed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have conceded the rule that the motion is not debatable; but if there is to be discussion upon it, I myself wish to be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must adhere to the ruling he has made.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me the Senator from Georgia is engaged in discussing the subject.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator desires to discuss the question, I shall move that the doors of the Senate be closed, and that the question whether the resolution shall be taken up shall be considered behind closed doors. I make that motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. BACON. That is not the motion, Mr. President. The rules provide that whenever a motion is made and seconded that a matter shall be considered behind closed doors the Senate shall proceed to deliberate with closed doors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the motion?

Mr. BRYAN. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors of the Senate.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to deliberate with closed doors. After 35 minutes the doors were reopened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to take from the table and to consider Senate resolution No. 94. [Putting the question.] The motion is lost.

Mr. BURTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANDELL's name was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANDELL], and ask that the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BACON (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia] is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Both Senators are absent.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. THOMPSON's name was called). I am requested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to announce that he is paired, and that he has been called back to his State by public business.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] has had to leave the Chamber on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I transfer the pair which I have with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Maryland has not voted.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently, not for the moment remembering that I had a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the pair of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I desire that statement to be recorded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted a moment ago without remembering that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] was absent. I have a pair with that Senator, which I will transfer to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of illness. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I desire also to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is absent on account of important business.

Mr. STERLING. I have a pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator and transfer it to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. LEWIS. I have been requested to announce the pairs of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]; the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]; the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 24, as follows:

At 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m. Mr. McCUMBER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

At 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. Mr. SWANSON and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

At 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m. Mr. OWEN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

After some further delay,

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I trust that before adjournment is taken to-day there may be an understanding that a special effort shall be put forth on both sides to secure the attendance of a quorum to-morrow.

The legislation that has been made the special order is of the very greatest importance to the general public. It involves the question of the safety of human life at sea. With sea disasters multiplying, shocking the whole world, with the history back of the 20-year effort to secure legislation upon this subject, with the organized opposition of steamship companies to it, I feel that the public ought to be informed, so that it can place the responsibility for this delay where it rightly belongs.

I trust that every effort will be put forth to induce absent Senators to return and be in their seats at 12 o'clock to-morrow, so that this bill may be taken up, considered deliberately, and after it has been thoroughly debated that it may be passed by the Senate and sent to the House.

It has the sanction and the approval of the administration. It has already received the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor, both of whom have investigated the subject thoroughly and have studied the pending bills.

Mr. President, there is no reason why every Senator should not feel under obligation to be here and join in securing action by the Senate upon this very important subject.

Mr. KERN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 21, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 20, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, our heavenly Father, touch, we beseech Thee, the better angels of our nature with the Holy Spirit that they may dominate our thoughts, quicken our hearts, and direct our ways, that our affections may go out with greater warmth to those near and dear, our sympathies to those who need our help and cheer, our hearts glow with patriotic zeal and fervor. And as the heavens are new every morning and fresh every evening, so may our lives be a perpetual memorial to Thee and receive Thine everlasting praise. In the Christ spirit. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, October 17, 1913, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 192. An act to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections; and

S. 834. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of Minneapolis, Minn., November 7 to 12, 1913; and

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 192. An act to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

S. 834. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 767. An act granting permission to the city of Marshfield, Oreg., to close Mill Slough in said city; and

S. 3296. An act to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ additional clerks on heirship work in the Indian Office.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LOBECK requests leave of absence for three days, on account of official business.

Mr. CLANCY requests leave of absence for three days, on account of official business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. To which one does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. To both.

The SPEAKER. Mr. LOBECK's request is on account of official business. The Chair did not know but that that would modify the gentleman's objection.

Mr. MANN. I do not know of any more important official business than that of attendance of a Member of Congress when the House of Representatives is in session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have this letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, October 18, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully ask leave of absence from the House for three days.

I expect to meet in New York Monday, the 20th of October, Dr. Frederick A. Cleveland, chairman of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, and together with him examine the methods of accounting in the customs service branch of the Treasury Department.

Hoping the request may be granted, I have the honor to be,

Yours, respectfully,

C. O. LOBECK,

Chairman Committee Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it is certain that no man in this House has taken, without protest and without complaint, half so much vilification from the papers here in Washington as I have. It is with much reluctance that I refer to the subject to-day. If the matter to which I now wish to refer were only a question between me and any one of these persistently malicious and maligning papers, I would not notice it. However, the Washington Evening Star, of date October 16, 1913, contained what purported to be a statement from Mr. William F. Gude, in which he is reported as having said that he did not know me, and that he had never seen me; and, consequently, that he had not made certain statements to me relative to the contemplated memorial bridge across the Potomac River. The newspaper article to which I refer quotes Mr. Gude as having made the following statement regarding the matter:

William F. Gude, to whom Representative JOHNSON referred as authority for the charge that the memorial bridge was a "real estate project," indignantly denies that he said anything of the kind, or anything upon which such a conclusion could be predicated. "I do not know Mr. JOHNSON," he said to a Star reporter, "and so far as I know I never saw him. I certainly did not hold any conversation with him upon the subject of the memorial bridge, nor did I appear before his committee in connection with the matter."

Mr. Gude did appear before the District Committee and make a statement. At the time of his appearance I was present and presiding as chairman of the committee. After several persons had addressed the committee, Mr. Gude arose and commenced an address. I did not know who he was. I asked several of the committee if they knew him. All replied in the negative. If I remember correctly, he was then asked his name, and he replied "Mr. Gude." I then asked several about me whether or not he was the Mr. Gude who had recently become somewhat notorious as a professional juror in land-condemnation cases. The answer received by me was that the Mr. Gude then before us was a brother to "Juror Gude." I was told this in the hearing of Mr. Godwin, a reporter for the Star who was present, and he leaned over to me and said that the man then making a statement to the committee was not a brother to the Mr. Gude who had been serving upon land-condemnation juries, but that he was the juror himself. I, as well as other members of the committee, asked Mr. Gude several questions relative to bridges across the Potomac, including the contemplated "memorial bridge," until he made the statement, in substance, that unless this "memorial bridge" was constructed the war between the North and the South might be forgotten. When he made that statement the committee dropped him, and he retired.

I say this much relative to the matter that my fellow Members here may be reassured that Mr. Gude has seen me, and that he has discussed bridges with me—the "memorial bridge" included. With this brief statement I shall dismiss the subject.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed the speech that I made in the Democratic caucus at the beginning of this Congress placing in nomination the Speaker of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EDWARDS requests leave of absence for 10 days on account of the serious illness of his brother.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will withdraw his objection to the request made by my colleague from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] for leave of absence. I happen to know, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. EDWARDS's brother has been desperately ill for some time. On Saturday he received a telegram from the attending physician, stating that his brother probably could not live more than 24 hours. Thereupon he immediately went home. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection, and I ask unanimous consent that Mr. EDWARDS be granted the leave of absence requested.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the matter comes to the point of sending for Mr. EDWARDS, if he is then detained by the illness of his brother, the House will undoubtedly gladly excuse him; but for the present I shall object to any request for leave to be absent from the House.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FOURTH-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put I should like to bring to the attention of the House the matter of the Interstate Commerce Commission granting the request of the Postmaster General to put printed books into fourth-class mail matter. I have this morning filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission an objection to that. I doubt whether there is a gentleman on the floor who has noticed the invitation of the Interstate Commerce Commission that those who desired to be heard on this question should come before the commission. I did not know of it until yesterday morning, and this morning I proceeded immediately to go before the commission, just before they entered this order, in which they wished to give their consent to the request of the Postmaster General. If this order goes into effect, we shall be paying on printed matter from all points east of Pittsburgh to Salt Lake 12 cents a pound while Canada can ship the same identical matter to those points for 8 cents a pound.

Mr. MANN. That is what I told the gentleman some time ago, when he was making a speech in favor of the proposition.

Mr. KINDEL. I want to show the gentleman that he is mistaken in this matter. I want to be heard, and there are others who want to be heard. I know of one house in New York that will be at a disadvantage of $300,000 per year just in the matter of postage on catalogues.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, the gentleman wants to be heard before the Interstate Commerce Commission and not before the House. It is not a matter for the House.

Mr. KINDEL. There are no sessions of the Post Office Committee or of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I want the public generally to know through the RECORD that I have been before the Interstate Commerce Commission and have there filed a written protest in this matter.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. Let us stay here and do business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. The Chair will count. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted.

Pending the count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time I concede that there are enough Members on the other side of the House to order the calling of the roll.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight Members have arisen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 37, answered "present" 13, not voting 294, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 21, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4267) granting a pension to Alexander Frazier, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 8958) for the relief of settlers on ceded Indian lands in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WALKER: A bill (H. R. 8959) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment with the cultivation of sea-island cotton, and to improve the seed, the staple, the production, and the cultivation thereof in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SLAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 8960) incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 8961) to donate to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for park purposes, the tract of land known as the powder-house lot; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 8962) granting an increase of pension to Richard S. Carr; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 8963) granting a pension to Mary F. Robinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8964) granting a pension to Bridget Connor; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8965) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two brass or bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Pottsville, in the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAHAN: A bill (H. R. 8966) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. McGaffey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8967) granting a pension to Ann Manley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8968) granting a pension to Adam Akers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8969) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Ayers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8970) granting an increase of pension to William Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8971) to correct the military record of Adam Akers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 8972) granting an increase of pension to John H. Estes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STOUT: A bill (H. R. 8973) for the relief of William Liskey; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: Evidence in support of House bill 5419, for the relief of William Woodhouse; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MCGILLICUDDY: Memorial of the State Board of Trade of Maine, favoring arbitration as a solution of international controversies; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAHAN: Paper to accompany House bill 8572, granting an increase of pension to Albert Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MONDELL: Petitions of sundry citizens of various towns and cities of Wyoming in support of House bill 5308, relative to mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Memorial of the board of trustees of the California State Library, favoring House resolution 227, relative to the extension of parcel post; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of the Alameda County Colored American Center of the California Civic League, protesting against the segregation of the colored employees in the Government departments at Washington; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, favoring passage of House bill 5308, relative to mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 21, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1673) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extensions of time within which to comply with the law and make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Grant and Franklin, State of Washington.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, November 7 to 12, 1913; and

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913.

CREMORA J. HOFFMAN.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia presented a paper to accompany the bill (S. 2735) granting a pension to Cremora J. Hoffman, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am just in receipt of a petition signed by more than 800 homestead settlers on the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservation lands, asking for legislation which will relieve them from paying the purchase price for those lands. The petition recites that there have been four successive failures of crops in that section of the country. The lands are situated in North and South Dakota, the greater part of them in South Dakota.

I deem this a matter of great importance, and I will ask to have the petition read, omitting the names of the petitioners, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

PETITION OF HOMESTEAD SETTLERS FOR RELIEF.

To the President of the United States, the Senate, and the House of Representatives:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that we are now residing on homesteads in those parts of the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock reservations in North and South Dakota open to homestead entry; that we have endeavored to procure such crops as would maintain ourselves, our families and live stock, but that there has prevailed over this territory during the past three years and to this date (Aug. 15, so late that we can expect no returns this season) a drought which has been as severe as any in the history of this territory, which has resulted in practically a total failure of all crops planted, and that there has not been sufficient growth of grass to afford the usual hay crop or pasture, wherefore many are compelled to dispose of their live stock or ship them to other localities at a great cost; that wells and creeks which have seldom, if ever, before gone dry are now failing, and that reasonable provisions and feed are to be had only at an exceedingly high price.

That under the most favorable conditions we can not recover from the present unfortunate conditions. Having had four crop failures, many of us have exhausted all our money and credit, and it will be all and more than we can do to provide a livelihood for ourselves and families; that we can not pay the appraised price of the land or the interest on the payments of same; that if we are obliged to do so many of us will be obliged to abandon our homes and forfeit the payments and interest already made and all we have expended in improvements and cultivation.

That, owing to the four successive crop failures many are leaving their land and seeking employment, which will cause a great depreciation in the value of the land. We know that the land outside of the reservation and the Indian land within the reservation are being sold at prices not to exceed the appraised value of the reservation lands.

That a number of us have commuted our homestead entries and have paid up the Government in full for our land, and are now in destitute circumstances and can obtain neither money nor credit, and that we will be compelled to leave our land unless we obtain relief.

Wherefore we do petition Congress for relief, and pray that Congress absolve and discharge us of the obligation of making further payments or paying further interest on account of the balance now remaining unpaid on these lands, and that those of us who have heretofore commuted our homestead entries and have paid up the Government in full for our land have the money so paid refunded or our homestead rights restored, and be given the privilege to enter another quarter of land in the Cheyenne River or Standing Rock Indian Reservations, in North and South Dakota, on which payments be abated.

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) to provide for furnishing additional rooms in the House Office Building, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suppose I ought to explain the joint resolution. It will take only a few moments.

In the last general deficiency appropriation act an appropriation of $220,370 was made for the construction of new offices in the House Office Building. It seems that the top floor had not been subdivided into rooms, and the increase in the membership of the House resulting from the last census left nearly 50 Members of the House unprovided with offices. Those offices are now nearly completed, the $220,370 appropriated for that purpose having been expended in completing them, but they are not furnished. The House passed this joint resolution appropriating $50,000 for furnishing 53 new rooms which have been constructed in the House Office Building.

The amount of $50,000 for furnishing those 53 rooms is on the basis of the expenditure made for the rooms originally furnished in that building. I have no doubt myself that the House Members are not provided with adequate and proper offices in which to do the work devolving upon them. These offices which have been constructed must be furnished in order that they may be taken care of. The amount estimated for has been figured out by the Clerk of the House. The joint resolution has been considered by the House Appropriations Committee and has passed the House, and I think it is proper that the Senate should pass the joint resolution, so that those rooms may be furnished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 3314) for the relief of the water users under what is known as the Yuma irrigation project, in Yuma County, Ariz.; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. JACKSON:

A bill (S. 3315) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Lorenzo Dorrittee; and

A bill (S. 3316) authorizing the Secretary of War to make a donation of condemned cannon and cannon balls to the city of Salisbury, Md.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 3317) for the relief of the estate of Bernard P. Mimmack and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 3318) granting a pension to Letta D. Webster; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on the 12th day of August the governor of Alabama appointed Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON to fill a vacancy in the unexpired term ending March 3, 1915, occasioned by the death of Joseph F. Johnston, late a Senator from that State. The certificate of appointment was presented to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That committee has made no report. I am now authorized and requested by the Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON to ask that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the certificate of appointment, he having declined, and so notified the governor, to accept or attempt to accept the appointment. I also ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the certificate of appointment or credentials of Mr. CLAYTON, and also that they be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections is discharged from the further consideration of the certificate of appointment referred to and it is withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 139) to relieve destitution among the native people and residents of Alaska, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIEF OF NATIVES OF ALASKA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 139) to relieve destitution among the native people and residents of Alaska was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to what committee has the joint resolution been referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not as yet been referred.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, because it relates to part of an appropriation that has already been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is for the purpose of transferring the unexpended balance of an appropriation to another purpose. Should it go to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the special order, which is Senate bill 136.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the proceedings of yesterday operated to defeat for the time the consideration of this important measure. The Senate was compelled to adjourn because no quorum was present, and a quorum could not be obtained. These facts impress me with the importance of ascertaining now whether it is possible to bring the Members of this body to a realization of the importance of this legislation in such a way as to insure their attendance so that the bill may be disposed of under the terms of the special order made with respect to it.

Two courses are open to those who are interested in this legislation. One is to raise the question of a quorum now and ascertain whether Senators are here or are absent. The other is to proceed with the discussion of the bill in the presence of some 30 or 35 Senators now on the floor and to continue in that way to-day and to-morrow and on Thursday be confronted, shortly before the order is to expire, with the fact that there is not a quorum of the Senate in the city of Washington, and then this measure, involving the safety of life at sea, must fail and receive no consideration possibly for months. The postponement of the determination of the presence of a quorum until shortly before the vote is to be taken might very easily leave us with the time so short that it would be impossible to secure the attendance of a sufficient number to insure action before the time when the order will expire.

For that reason, Mr. President, I will now test that question. If it shall be developed that a quorum is not present, I ask the Senate to take such action as will compel the attendance of a quorum of the Senate, so that a vote may be had upon this measure.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. Before the Senator calls for a quorum I should like to be heard for a moment on the same subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. At this time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, very little, if anything, that I have ever said here or elsewhere deserves to live or to be resurrected, but I shall, nevertheless, now read to the Senate the brief statement I made here on October 9.

The statement is as follows:

While I do not happen to have the honor to be a member of the committee which reported this bill, I must not let this occasion pass without saying here that I am extremely pleased that the bill has been reported. I have given the bill considerable study, not only during this session but during the last session. Before I came to Congress I gave a bill somewhat similar to this measure much study.

This bill has for its object the promotion of the safety of human life at sea. Do we need another Titanic disaster to convince us of our duty on this bill? How much longer must we delay when matters of such supreme importance are before us? The bill not only promotes the safety of passengers and the crew of the vessel at sea, but it also has for its beneficent purpose the abolition of a very odious form of involuntary servitude that has been carried on and imposed upon many helpless seamen.

We are here; Congress is supposed to be in session; and we ought in good faith to the people of the United States manfully to legislate on all subjects upon which we have jurisdiction or manfully to adjourn.

I join with those who say we ought not to ping-pong about from Thursday to Monday, then from Monday to Thursday. Let us diligently take up subjects of legislation and treat them as they should be treated, or have the nerve and pluck to adjourn—I was about to say resign; yes, if we can not do our work we ought to resign.

I earnestly hope that no objection will be made, for this bill or some bill of this same general character should have been passed years ago.

Mr. President, on October 13 I spoke as follows here in the Senate:

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a moment ago a motion was made and carried that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Thursday next. I am a new Senator here, and would be presumptuous if I attempted to put my limited experience into the scales against the experience of elder Senators. But I warn the Senate, I warn especially the Democratic Members of the Senate, that no party can fool the American people. Let us either manfully work or manfully adjourn.

I protest with all the vehemence of which I am capable against trying to make the American people believe that we are at work when we are not. On the calendar there are 40 or 50 bills that have been reported. They should be passed or defeated. Is the United States Senate afraid to meet the bills that are upon the calendar? Is any Senator afraid to vote yea or nay on the bills?

We are drawing salaries paid to us for performing our duties, and I again protest, and shall continue to protest, against a procedure of pretending to be at work when we are not. Now, why may we not meet at 2 o'clock every afternoon and take up the calendar? Many bills of great importance to the country are pending on that calendar requiring attention. There is an enormous work and an immense responsibility just ahead of the Democratic Party. The serious economic conditions facing us require that we give studious, assiduous, and careful attention to legislation in addition to the tariff and the currency.

Mr. President, when the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] urged that the seamen's bill, so called, be made the unfinished business I joined in that request and also urged that the bill be passed at an early day, because the discussion of such legislation is entering now upon its twenty-third year and can not now fairly be called "hasty legislation." At the very time, at the very hour, indeed, sir, at the very moment we were urging that this bill should be discussed the Volturro was burning on the high seas and valuable—all human lives are valuable—lives were lost because the seamen were not sufficiently experienced in the method and manner of lowering lifeboats.

This is a meritorious bill; no more meritorious bill has been presented to Congress since I have been a Member. It has for its purpose amongst other things the abolition of an odious form of involuntary servitude that has been imposed upon seamen far, far too long. We have made this bill the unfinished business. The Senate should either adjourn or send for the absentees to come here; and above all things we should not carry on this miserable farce of pretending that we are at work when we are not. Further to prolong the present situation would be showing bad faith, which the Senate can not show and never yet has exhibited on a question of unanimous-consent agreements.

Our word is pledged to the American people, and pledged to each other, that we will consider the bill and that at not later than 4 o'clock on next Thursday we will vote upon it. When we entered into that agreement we presupposed that we would have a quorum. For myself I do not believe, I can not believe, that any Senator would so far forget himself, would so far forget the proprieties of this place, would so far forget his duty as to defer action on this bill by any means or any motion which would seek willfully to break a quorum in view of the fact that we have agreed to vote next Thursday.

The people of the United States admire directness and boldness. If we should all resign they would be very grateful to some of us; if we should adjourn, many of them would be grateful; if we should go to work, the whole Nation would be grateful; but no one will be grateful if we pretend to be at work when we are not. Let us press forward and perform the high and important duties of these honorable positions, the seats in the Senate, to which we have been called.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think we are all agreed that it is rather an unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves, attempting to consider important measures when we are struggling at the same time to keep a quorum. There is only one way, in my judgment, in which we can keep a quorum here, and that is to have it understood once and for all that we are going to proceed to consider all such legislation as may properly come before us until such time as the currency bill arrives here. The pending bill is an important measure; everyone will concede that; but there are also other matters of importance in which Senators are vitally interested; and Senators are away because of the fact that it is not anticipated that any continuous course of legislation will be had.

I should like, if the Senate would do so, to see the announcement made that we will proceed to legislation and to consider all matters which may properly come before us in due course of business. Then Senators will return here and they will remain here. There is no reason, to my mind, why we should not do so, because the currency bill will certainly not be before us for 15 or 20 days. In the meantime we could consider other measures—some of them, it is true, of a local nature, but nevertheless very important and of more than ordinary concern to those who are interested from a local standpoint. In this way, Mr. President, we can bring the Senate here and proceed to business. I can not see why we should not proceed in the usual way to consider all such matters as may properly come before us. If we are to stay here—and I am quite willing to stay upon that program—let us dispatch business.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], but I should like to have it understood that when Senators are called back here they shall be called here for continuous work. I have not urged some measures in which I am interested for the reason that I felt absolutely certain that we would not get a quorum. I did suppose that the importance of this bill would secure the attendance of a quorum, but it seems that so far it has not done so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the attitude in which we find ourselves is not only unfortunate, as suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but that it is humiliating. We ought either to adjourn, or we ought to do the business which we are uncommissioned to do. I simply repeat a remark that I made a few days ago when the subject was before the Senate. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Idaho, that so long as it is understood that nothing will be done, that no general legislation will be considered, it will be found practically impossible to keep a quorum of the Senate in the city of Washington.

I do not know whether it is in the contemplation of those who really control the movement of the Senate that there shall be an adjournment; the newspapers seem to be very conflicting in their reports upon that matter; but my conclusion, from everything that I have been able to see, is that we are not to adjourn until the banking and currency bill is disposed of. If that be true—and we might as well determine that at one time as another—then the committees of the Senate ought to reassemble and resume their work.

Take the Committee on Interstate Commerce, for example. I happen to know something about its calendar, because I am a member of that committee. There are upon its calendar now bills that are of the first importance to the American people. I am not now speaking of the great measures which are intended to further regulate the trusts and monopolies of the country, but I am speaking of other legislation for which there is a universal demand. We have not had a meeting of the Interstate Commerce Committee this session, save a preliminary meeting, in which it was announced that nothing would be done save mere organization. I did not complain of that in the early part of the session, because all Senators were absorbed in the consideration of the tariff bill; but that is now over; we have time in which that work ought to be done, and Senators ought to be here doing it. Therefore, I think the Senator from Wisconsin is right. We might as well determine now whether we can secure enough Senators to do business, not alone the business now before the Senate, but all the business that would naturally come before the body.

Here is a measure that deeply concerns the welfare of a great body of men, who for years—yes; for centuries—have suffered from a brutality and a tyranny that shock the sense of civilized men whenever it is described, and we are confronted with the danger that when we come to the moment of voting we will not have a quorum of the Senate here to declare their purpose.

I think it is due the country that the Senate this morning shall proclaim that we intend from now on to consider the business of the country, to consider it diligently, and to consider it every day until an adjournment takes place. Therefore I hope that the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin will bear fruit and that we will, before we take a vote upon this bill, have a quorum here that is willing to stay without having the Sergeant at Arms at their elbows.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that we now proceed to the discussion of the pending bill, as he, no doubt, will open the discussion and no doubt the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will require some time to answer.

I desire also in this connection to call his attention to the unanimous-consent agreement. In my opinion, it is not necessary under that agreement that the vote shall be taken on Thursday, for it provides:

And that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on Thursday, October 23, 1913, the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

Or, in other words, if the bill is not disposed of upon the calendar day of Thursday, it will be disposed of just as soon thereafter as the Senate can develop a quorum and vote upon it. The Senate can not after Thursday, unless the bill is then disposed of, do any other business. The only thing after 4 o'clock Thursday that can be done is to vote upon amendments that may be offered or amendments that may be pending and on the bill itself; but there is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement that compels a vote upon that calendar day. Generally, in unanimous-consent agreements it is provided that the vote shall be taken either upon the calendar day or the legislative day; but this unanimous-consent agreement does not so provide.

I believe there is a quorum of the Senate present in the city, and I really believe that there will be a quorum present on Thursday; but even if there is not, Mr. President, we will be in just as good a position, and better, if we discuss this question now and get the discussion back of us and then develop a quorum as we would be to do it this morning. I simply suggest this to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Utah think that it is a very dignified thing to discuss a bill in the absence of Senators, hoping we may not get a quorum after it is discussed?

Mr. SMOOT. There are more Senators now present in the Chamber than are generally present when many very important subjects are discussed.

Mr. BORAH. So much the worse for the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the Senator will admit what I have said, will he not?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether I will admit it or not. I do know that Senators do not attend in the Chamber at all times, but they are generally close enough—in the cloakrooms—so that if a Senator becomes interesting they can come in.

Mr. President, I would not object to any action the Senator from Wisconsin might take in regard to his own bill, of course, and if the course suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] should be satisfactory to him I would not object; but as for myself, I do feel that we ought to have here a Senate with a readiness and showing an outward disposition to consider these matters as a Senate and that we should not simply creep along, getting the bill through by piecemeal and by calling in a quorum under great excitement and force of arms in order to pass a very important measure. There ought to be something left to this body in the way of dignity and a sense of responsibility; and I maintain that when a measure of this importance is being considered it ought not even to go into the Reconn that we propose to discuss and consider it in the absence of a quorum of the Senate, in the hope that we can force enough into the Chamber so that we can vote on the bill when that stage is reached in its consideration.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I am quite in sympathy with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in his efforts in behalf of this bill. I am also quite in sympathy with him in his efforts to secure a quorum, that the Senate may proceed in the orderly conduct of its business. Speaking for the majority, on yesterday I sent out a notice to all the Members of this side who are in the city and telegraphed to all those absent who were at all likely to be able to arrive here during the day. There are now in the city, from the best information I can get, 48 Senators, 31 of whom are Democrats and 17 Republicans, there being 19 absentees on the majority side and 28 absentees on the minority side.

I do not know whether or not a quorum can be had to-day except by means of extraordinary process. I am in favor of the exercise of all the power of the Senate to bring a quorum here for the transaction of business. I think it would be a public misfortune for those present to surrender to the absentees. It seems to me it would be a confession to the country and to the world that the Senate of the United States is unable to carry on the business entrusted to it by the people, even business of this important kind.

I do not understand how any man can read the petition of the seamen to this body, which has been made a public document, without being impressed with the vital importance of this measure. It is not only a question of the preservation of human life, spoken of by the Senator from Wisconsin, but a question of human liberty as well. It is a question in which all men who love liberty are deeply interested and all those who are interested in the preservation of human life and the averting of such horrible calamities as have recently occurred upon the seas.

As to absentees, I do not desire to speak in terms of censure regarding many of those who are not here. There are members of the Finance Committee who have spent the summer here who are well-nigh broken in health. My colleague is one of them. I can understand why those men, men whose health has been impaired, are now seeking a little needed rest. There are two or three or four other Senators, not members of the Finance Committee, who are absent on account of ill health. Of course no word of censure is applicable to cases of that kind. But there is no sort of reason why a majority of the Senate should not be in attendance and why a quorum should not be maintained.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] in regard to taking up the regular business of the Senate, and as to whether or not there is to be an adjournment, I will say that I have no information upon that subject. I have no information that leads me to believe there will be a speedy adjournment of this body. I can see no reason why the regular business of the Senate should not be taken up, or why we should not proceed to work in the ordinary way.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I presume I will not be considered as one generally apologizing for those who are not present in their seats in this Chamber. I am myself a very ardent advocate of the proposition that it is the duty of every Senator to be in his seat at all times when not necessarily absent, and I have endeavored to square my own conduct with that rule throughout my service in the Senate. At the same time I think something should be said to relieve Senators who are now absent from any improper censure on account of their absence at this time.

During the time I have been in the Senate I have never seen an occasion when a quorum of the Senate was not easily obtainable until the present time. I think the absence of a quorum now, or the difficulty in obtaining one, is due to a fact which all must concede—that present conditions are abnormal and have been so recognized and in a measure consented to.

It is a well-known fact that this session was called as an extraordinary session for specific purposes. While some other measures have had some degree of consideration, it has been recognized by Senators on both sides of the Chamber that we were not expected to engage in the regular activities of legislation which are usually found in a session not called for some specific purpose, as this has been.

I think it will be conceded that among the Senators who are now absent are many of the most faithful, diligent, and painstaking Members of the Senate. Everybody will concede that. When we were first called in extraordinary session it was recognized that it was for the purpose of considering and, if found practicable, of passing a bill upon the tariff. It was recognized that during all the time the tariff bill was before the Finance Committee the Senate was practically doing what is popularly called "marking time." In other words, it was nominally remaining in session for the purpose of being in readiness to receive the report of the Finance Committee when it should come and of then proceeding to act upon it.

When the tariff was disposed of, the currency question was recognized as the measure which alone required us to remain here. I do not mean by that that it was alone what we were to do, but that in its absence we undoubtedly should have adjourned. That is what I mean.

When we disposed of the tariff bill and took up the currency bill it was generally recognized that the Senate was again going to be nominally in session, and Senators will remember that it was even proposed that there should be a formal unanimous agreement that the Senate should meet and adjourn every third day, simply complying with the requirement of the Constitution in that regard, but being in practical recess. That was objected to, if I recollect rightly, by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], who insisted that if we were not to have a recess covering a period of time which would permit Senators to go to their homes and remain there for some time he would not consent to it. The consequence was that the proposal was not pressed, and we have continued in this condition.

The point I wish to make, simply in justice to absent Senators, is that while we have had no such agreement it has been recognized that that was practically what would be done; and while nothing has stood in the way of considering any matter that the Senate might decide to consider, Senators have been absent upon that idea. I see before me Senators now present who have been home and have stayed a month. Nobody criticized them for it. Since their return other Senators who were in their places during the absence of those Senators have taken advantage of the opportunity, when they understood the Senate would not be engaged in active work, to themselves enjoy a similar privilege.

I say this much simply in justification of Senators who are absent. My colleague is one of them. He has been here regularly and faithfully every day, and only three days since went home for a week's rest and for attention to some matters of business. What I say of my colleague is true of a number of other Senators whom I have in my mind and whom other Senators will readily recall as being among the most diligent, faithful, and active Members of this body. Therefore, I think, they ought not to be the subject of unqualified condemnation on account of their absence.

It is perfectly competent for the Senate, if it sees proper to do so, to say that that understood condition is no longer to continue, and that from now on we propose to take up the business of the Senate and proceed with it in the regular manner as if we were in regular session. Then every Senator will be upon notice; and every Senator who after that absents himself will be legitimately the subject of the criticism which is now passed upon those who are absent.

I have thought it proper to say this much in justice to Senators who are absent, many of whom, I repeat, are among the most valued, diligent, and faithful Members of this body, and who are now absent because of that general understanding, and who will return to their seats and resume their active duties here as soon as they learn that that abnormal condition is no longer to continue, but that we propose to proceed actively with the business of legislation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if there were present to-day the Senators who have absented themselves from attendance upon the Senate since the Senate made the present order a special order of business, we would have a quorum. Senators who have gone to their homes or elsewhere, either for pleasure or for business, since that order was entered by the Senate have done so, not as stated by my friend from Georgia, with the understanding that the Senate was to transact no business, but with full knowledge of the fact that the Senate was to begin on Thursday of last week the consideration of this measure. Its consideration was to continue until Thursday of this week, at which time the Senate would vote.

The suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that by the literal terms of the unanimous-consent agreement this measure need not be disposed of on Thursday can perhaps be sustained. Perhaps it will not be questioned. I do not know about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator permit the Chair to make an observation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With very great pleasure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the fact that the United States Senate is a self-governing body. The Chair is frequently wrong in his rulings; but in order that when the Senate disagrees with the Chair it may do so deliberately, and not upon the impulse of the moment, the Chair is going to rule now that on Thursday at 4 o'clock, unless an appeal be taken from the ruling of the Chair, no motion will be considered except to send for absent Senators until the unanimous-consent agreement is disposed of.

That may be a wrong ruling, but the Chair thought it well to make it now. If the Senate thinks the Chair is wrong, an appeal may be taken at that time and the Chair's ruling reversed. The Chair thinks a unanimous-consent agreement sets aside every rule of the Senate. When the Senate has agreed to do a certain thing at a certain time, it must do it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I quite agree with the object the Chair has in view; but do I understand the Chair to mean that a motion to adjourn would not be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair means there will have to be an appeal from the Chair before such a motion will be entertained.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that it will occur; but I believe that under the rules a motion to adjourn is in order at any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not pretend to be right; but the Chair is submitting the matter to the Senate now for consideration, because the question is liable to arise.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, we will not discuss it at this time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, impressed as I am with the belief that this measure is so important that the Members of the Senate should be here in full quorum when it is taken up for consideration, and because of the possibility that on Thursday, for lack of time, we may not be able to obtain the attendance of a quorum, I purpose to raise that question now and to seek, in so far as I am able, to maintain a quorum until this special order has been executed.

I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for the calling of the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Sterling
Bacon	Goff	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Myers	Sutherland
Borah	Hollis	Norris	Swanson
Brady	Hughes	O'Gorman	Thornton
Bristow	Jackson	Page	Tillman
Bryan	James	Pomerene	Vardaman
Burton	Kenyon	Shafroth	Williams
Chamberlain	Kern	Sheppard
Chilton	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.
Cummins	Lane	Smoot

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANDELL]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is absent owing to illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I request that the names of the absent Senators be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. REED, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. WEEKS answered to their names when called.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of illness, and that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is absent on account of important business. I will have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BACON. I wish to state for my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia] that after having been here during the entire summer very ardently engaged in the business of the session he has been called away by some necessary matters which needed his attention for a few days, and that in his absence he is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to state that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] intended to be present, but he is confined to his home on account of illness. He will reach Washington just as soon as it is possible for him to leave home.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and that the junior Senator from Delaware is necessarily absent at this time.

Mr. KERN. I think it ought to be stated that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is absent on business of the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who is also absent on the same business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names, less than a quorum.

Mr. KERN (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

At 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to notify by telegram all absent Senators to return immediately and attend upon the sessions of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

At 2 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m. Mr. OWEN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

At 2 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m. Mr. LEWIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the pending bill the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose the amendment as a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For the entire bill. I ask that the proposed substitute may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections. And in all merchant vessels of the United States of more than 100 tons gross the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen, oilers, and water tenders into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty alternately for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; and seamen serving in one department of a vessel shall not be required to do duty in another department; but these provisions shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays, but this shall not prevent the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage; and at all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section, the seamen shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and shall, upon demand, receive wages then earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts."

SEC. 2. That section 4529 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4529. The master or owner of any vessel making coasting voyages shall pay to every seaman his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped, or at the time such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in case of vessels making foreign voyages, or from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged, or within 4 days after the seaman has been discharged, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall be entitled to be paid at the time of his discharge on account of wages a sum equal to one-third part of the balance due him. Every master or owner who refuses or neglects to make payment in the manner hereinbefore mentioned without sufficient cause shall pay to the seaman a sum equal to two days' pay for each and every day during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods, which sum shall be recoverable as wages in any claim made before the court; but this section shall not apply to masters or owners of any vessel the seamen of which are entitled to share in the profits of the cruise or voyage."

SEC. 3. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive, within 48 hours after demand therefor, from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which shall be due him at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended; and all stipulations to the contrary shall be held as void. And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due him as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552 of the Revised Statutes any court having jurisdiction may upon good cause shown set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require: Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

SEC. 4. That section 4559 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4559. Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel, while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon, in any of these or like cases, the consular or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section."

SEC. 5. That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation," approved March 3, 1897, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of less than 100 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel shall have a space of not less than 100 cubic feet and not less than 16 square feet, measured on the floor or deck of that place, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein, and each seaman shall have a berth for his exclusive use and not more than one berth shall be placed one above another; such place or lodging shall be securely constructed, properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvia of cargo or bilge water. And every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of the crew occupying said place in use during the voyage."

"Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section, so far as they are applicable thereto, by providing sleeping room in the engine room of such steamboat, properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated."

"All merchant vessels of the United States, the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, having more than 10 men on deck must have for the use of the sailors at least one light, clean, and properly ventilated washing place. There shall be provided at least one washing outfit for every 2 men of the watch. The washing place shall be properly heated. A separate washing place shall be provided for the fireroom and engine-room men, if their number exceed 10, which shall be large enough to accommodate at least one-sixth of them at the same time, and have hot and cold water supply and a sufficient number of wash basins, sinks, and shower baths."

"Any failure to comply with this section shall subject the owner or owners of such vessels to a penalty of $500: Provided, That forecasts shall be fumigated at such intervals as may be provided by regulations to be issued by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the approval of the Department of Commerce, and shall have at least two exits, one of which may be used in emergencies."

SEC. 6. That section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4596. Whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offenses he shall be punished as follows:

"First. For desertion, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned."

"Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute."

"Third. For quitting the vessel, without leave, after her arrival at the port of her delivery and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay."

"Fourth. For willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture from his wages of not more than four days' pay, or, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than one month."

"Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than 3 months, at the discretion of the court."

"Sixth. For assaulting any master or mate, by imprisonment for not more than two years."

"Seventh. For willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo, by forfeiture out of his wages of a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than 12 months."

"Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage, and the whole or any part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, and he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months: Provided, That in any suit to recover damages for any injury sustained on board vessel or in its service seamen having command shall not be held to be fellow servants with those under their authority."

SEC. 7. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where seamen or officers are accused, the consular officer shall inquire into the facts and proceed as provided in section 4583 of the Revised Statutes; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew list and shipping articles and official log the cause of such discharge and the particulars in which the cruel or unusual treatment consisted and subscribe his name thereto officially. He shall read the entry made in the official log to the master, and his reply thereto, if any, shall likewise be entered and subscribed in the same manner."

SEC. 8. That section 4611 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable. Any failure on the part of such master to comply therewith, which failure shall result in the escape of such officer, shall render the master or the vessel liable in damages for such punishment to the person illegally punished by such officer."

SEC. 9. That section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended as regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of four quarts of water there shall be a requirement of five quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requirement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day."

SEC. 10. That section 24 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That section 10 of chapter 121 of the laws of 1884, as amended by section 3 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages, or to make any order or note or any other evidence of indebtedness therefor to any other person, or to pay any person, for the shipment of seamen when payment is deducted or to be deducted from a seaman's wages. Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case, except as herein provided, absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment, he shall for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500."

"(b) That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children."

"(c) That no allotment shall be valid unless signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law. All stipulations for the allotment of any part of the wages of a seaman during his absence which are made at the commencement of the voyage shall be inserted in the agreement and shall state the amounts and times of the payments to be made and the persons to whom the payments are to be made.

"(d) That no allotment except as provided for in this section shall be lawful. Any person who shall falsely claim to be such relation as above described of a seaman under this section shall for every such offense be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

"(e) That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels while in waters of the United States as to vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for similar violation.

"The master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel seeking clearance from a port of the United States shall present his shipping articles at the office of clearance, and no clearance shall be granted any such vessel unless the provisions of this section have been complied with.

"(f) That under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce the Commissioner of Navigation shall make regulations to carry out this section."

SEC. 11. That section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4536. No wages due or accruing to any seaman or apprentice shall be subject to attachment or arrestment from any court, and every payment of wages to a seaman or apprentice shall be valid in law, notwithstanding any previous sale or assignment of wages or of any attachment, encumbrance, or arrestment thereon; and no assignment or sale of wages or of salvage made prior to the accruing thereof shall bind the party making the same except such allotments as are authorized by this title. This section shall apply to fishermen employed on fishing vessels as well as to other seamen: Provided, That nothing contained in this or any preceding section shall interfere with the order by any court regarding the payment by any seaman of any part of his wages for the support and maintenance of his wife and minor children."

SEC. 12. That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers, are of a rating not less than able seaman: Provided, That no vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she is provided and equipped with a sufficient number of seaworthy lifeboats to carry and transport at one time every passenger and every member of the crew licensed to be carried on board such vessel and unless she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seaman or higher, who shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

No person shall be rated as an able seaman unless he is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. Any person may make application to any board of local inspectors for a certificate of service as able seaman, and upon proof being made to said board by affidavit, under rule approved by the Secretary of Commerce, showing the nationality of the applicant and the vessel or vessels on which he has had service and that he has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes, the board of local inspectors shall issue to said applicant a certificate of service, which shall be retained by him and be accepted as prima facie evidence of his rating as an able seaman.

Each board of local inspectors shall keep a complete record of all certificates of service issued by them and to whom issued and shall keep on file the affidavits upon which said certificates are issued.

The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any citizen of the United States setting forth that this section is not being complied with, cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine the fact; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section: Provided, That the collector of customs shall not be required to cause such muster of the crew to be made unless said sworn information has been filed with him for at least six hours before the vessel departs, or is scheduled to depart: Provided further, That any person that shall knowingly make a false affidavit for such purpose shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, within the discretion of the court. Any violation of any provision of this section shall subject the owner of such vessel to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $500.

SEC. 13. That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

SEC. 14. That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of the United States in foreign countries, and for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, ought to be terminated, and to this end the President be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, within 90 days after the passage of this act, to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, that so much as hereinbefore described of all such treaties and conventions between the United States and foreign Governments will terminate on the expiration of such periods after notices have been given as may be required in such treaties and conventions.

SEC. 15. That upon the expiration after notice of the periods required, respectively, by said treaties and conventions and of one year in the case of the independent State of the Kongo, so much as hereinbefore described in each and every one of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and to be of no force and effect, and thereupon so much of sections 4081 and 5280 of the Revised Statutes as relates to the arrest or imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, shall be and is hereby repealed.

SEC. 16. That this act shall take effect, as to all vessels of the United States, 90 days after its passage, and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, save and except that such parts hereof as provide for the abrogation of any stipulation by treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall only take effect after such notice, and at the expiration of such time as may be required by the terms of such treaty, stipulation, or convention.

SEC. 17. That section 16 of the act approved December 21, 1898, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," be amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"Provided, That at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, if any seaman incapacitated from service by injury or illness is on board a vessel so situated that a prompt discharge requiring the personal appearance of the master of the vessel before an American consul or consular agent is impracticable, such seaman may be sent to a consul or consular agent, who shall care for him and defray the cost of his maintenance and transportation, as provided in this paragraph."

SEC. 18. That section 5280, Revised Statutes, except as hereinbefore provided, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

MR. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall in a brief way present to the Senate the difference between the bill reported by the committee and the substitute which I have offered. I shall not discuss in great detail the difference between the two measures. It is apparent from the interest the Senate manifests in this legislation that the subject has been thoroughly studied, that Senators are well advised and have arrived at a definite conclusion as to the merits of the proposed measures. So I shall take the time of the Senate only to touch, as it were, the essential points of difference between the two measures.

The substitute provides for a nine-hour workday. The Nelson bill, reported by the committee, provides for a nine-hour workday, but admits of 12 hours, by adding a proviso that no seaman shall be called upon to do more than 12 hours' work in a day. This is a very adroit qualification of the limitation, and in effect means the establishment by law of a 12-hour workday for seamen, in port as well as at sea.

The substitute I have presented grants to a seaman one-half of the money earned and not paid to him in every port where the vessel loads or discharges cargo.

MR. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

MR. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should prefer to make my parallel of the two bills as I have set out to make it, and then submit to interruptions.

MR. BURTON. It is merely on this question of 12 hours' work.

MR. LA FOLLETTE. It is merely for the purpose of making a connected statement that I prefer to make it in this way. I shall be glad to be interrogated after I have concluded.

MR. BURTON. I give notice, then, that I shall wish to be heard as to the 12-hour provision.

MR. LA FOLLETTE. I anticipate that the Senator probably will wish to be heard upon all of the provisions of the substitute.

The substitute I have offered grants to a seaman one-half of the money earned and not paid to him in every port where the vessel loads or discharges cargo. This is made applicable to foreign vessels while in ports of the United States, and the courts of the United States are opened to the men to enforce the provision. The original bill seems to confer upon seamen on foreign ships the same privilege, but by a proviso it limits its application to foreign vessels owned in major part by American citizens, corporations, or holding companies. It is in main part by its provisos and exceptions that the bill reported by the committee takes away from the seamen on foreign ships the benefits which the body of the measure professes to confer upon them.

Consider this particular proviso in practical operation. The seamen do not know how a vessel is owned. If a seaman demanded a part of his wages under this proviso, the master could deny it on the ground that the vessel was not owned in major part by American capital. The seaman would be in no position to disprove the statement if it was not true, and the effect would be to deny to him altogether the benefits sought to be conferred by this section.

The substitute I have offered provides a certain amount of forecabin space and compels the installation of sanitary conveniences in vessels having a crew of 10 or more on deck. The bill reported by the committee limits this provision to vessels carrying 20 men or more on deck. I suppose there is not a Senator here who has any idea of how significant is that limitation of the crew in the bill. How many men would be benefited by it, or how many men would be excluded from the benefits it proposes to confer. As a matter of fact, there are not a dozen vessels under the American flag to which the provision would apply in the form in which it is reported from the committee. Think of that. Here is a provision ostensibly for the benefit of American seamen, and then so limiting it that it would be applicable to only a dozen vessels.

The substitute I have offered provides a standard of efficiency for seamen, under which they are to be designated as "able seaman." An able seaman is defined to be one who is not under 19 years of age and who has had three years' experience on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

That is the lowest standard set by any modern foreign statute. The substitute provides that not less than two men of the grade of able seaman, or men of higher rating, shall be provided for each lifeboat. The substitute provides that every vessel before it shall be permitted to put to sea shall have an equipment of lifeboats sufficient to carry at one time all of the people on board—passengers, officers, sailors, everybody. Then it provides as a standard of efficiency for the crew that there shall be two men for each of those lifeboats who are able seamen; that is two men 19 years of age or older who have been at least three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

The substitute makes another provision, and without meeting its requirements no vessel is to be permitted to go to sea unless at least 75 per cent of the crew shall be able to understand every order issued by an officer in command. The substitute makes another requirement, and that is that, starting at 40 per cent and increasing 5 per cent a year, the crew on deck shall be able seamen, until at the beginning of the fifth year 65 per cent of the crew of every vessel that leaves an American port shall be able seamen.

Now, let us assemble those requirements. In the first place, 75 per cent of the crew in each department must be able to understand every order issued to them. This would compel at least 75 per cent of the crew on deck to understand the language of the officers. So far as men are concerned, the deck crew is the part of the equipment of every vessel responsible for its safe navigation. It is not those who are down in the hold, not those who are in the engine room, who see nothing, who know nothing about the condition of the vessel except as they are informed by the tap of a bell. It is the men on deck who see, who know, who are there to respond and to meet conditions—the men who are trained to study the face of the ocean and the sky, and to interpret their meaning. Those are the men who are charged, and must really be charged, with the safe navigation of the vessel.

The substitute provides that when a vessel puts to sea 75 per cent of the crew, to begin with—not only those on deck, but those in every department—shall understand the language of the officers of the boat, so that they can understand and comprehend the orders. Assuming the officers of the vessel to be Americans and to speak the English language, 75 per cent of the crew in every department are required to understand enough of English to be able to comprehend the orders.

That is requirement No. 1. Is that unreasonable? The committee bill has no requirement of that character. The committee bill provides that the men at the wheel and on the lookout shall be able to understand English; that is all. It provides that there shall be enough men on board who can act as interpreters to have one interpreter assigned to each lifeboat. It does not provide for the number of lifeboats, but it provides that there shall be assigned to each lifeboat one interpreter who can translate the orders of the officers when they are given to the crew; that is all.

While I am on that subject I might just as well dispose of it. Just conceive what that means! Suppose a vessel is at sea, in a storm, in a collision; it has encountered an iceberg, as the Titanic did; it has met some foreign boat, manned by Chinese stupefied by opium. They have not obeyed the rule of the road on the sea. There is a collision. The vessel is loaded with passengers. The shock has gone through the great craft. Perhaps it is at midnight; everywhere is consternation, confusion, and excitement. An officer is on the bridge. Let us suppose for a minute that this vessel is equipped under the committee bill. What has it?

It may have a crew representing many nationalities. It may have and comply with the terms of the committee bill some from the Mediterranean, some from India, some from South Africa, some from Germany, some from the Netherlands, some from China, and some from Japan. They know no word of English. One group can not communicate or converse with or have intercourse intelligently with the other. But that crew complies with the terms of the bill that the committee has reported to the Senate, if for every lifeboat there is a man who can interpret between the commander and all these representatives of different nations. He can communicate pretty well with the German, not so well with the Frenchman who happens to be in the crew, not half so well with the man from Turkey, but he has got along well enough so that the inspector has passed him as an interpreter for a lifeboat crew.

Suppose he was the best interpreter on earth and had only one language which he had to use besides that of the officer of the vessel in order to have the lifeboat crew understand what they were to do, just think for a minute of having to pass orders at a time like that through an interpreter. There are lawyers sitting on this floor this afternoon who have been in court and observed the interpreter, the best man who could be selected in the county, serving as a translator between the witness and the court and the jury. They have seen him surrounded by perfect order and all of the conditions that would give him the very best exercise of all his faculties, and they have seen him troubled to get the right word to convey the meaning. But here at sea, the vessel with her side stove in, it may be, no one knows whether she can be kept afloat for even an hour, orders are to be given, and have to be understood, and have to be executed upon the instant. The officer is on the bridge. The men are at the lifeboats. He issues his orders for lifeboat No. 1 in this language or lifeboat No. 2 in that, and so on; and even if there should be no mistake there is the necessary delay until the order can be thoroughly understood in the language in which it is issued before it can be translated into the language of the crew.

Now, Mr. President, is there any reason for that? There is not, except in the interest of the men who own the steamships. That is all. The paragraph of the substitute providing that 75 per cent of the crew in each department of a vessel shall understand the language of the officers has been opposed solely in the interest and for the benefit of the great capital that is in control of the large steamship lines and is behind the organized opposition to proper legislation in behalf of the preservation of life at sea. It stood in the way successfully here in the Senate and over in the other end of the Capitol for 20 years in defeating legislation. It shall prevail no longer. Justice at last shall have a day.

It must appeal to the intelligence and to the conscience of every Senator here that at least three-fourths of the crew in every department shall be able to understand the orders of the officers of the vessel. That is reasonable. That is what the substitute provides.

Mr. President, the next provision for efficiency in the substitute is that for the first year after the passage of this bill, if it shall pass, 40 per cent of the deck crew, exclusive of the licensed officers, shall be sailors of a rating not less than "able seaman." Forty per cent for the first year is not enough. In the opinion of men who have investigated and who have by study of this great subject become authorities on the subject. No man has ever suggested that a crew less than three-fourths of the total crew on deck should be able seamen. When the seamen prepared their bill—and they are interested in safety for themselves, to begin with—they wrote into their bill that 75 per cent of the crew should be able seamen. But, oh, they have been harried and delayed and worn out by the committees of Congress who have been pliant to the steamship companies. So in the hope of getting through their measure they said, "We will start with 40 per cent on deck who are able seamen for the first year"; the second year, 45; the third year, 50; the fourth year, 55; and so on up finally until they achieve 65 per cent, and they have said: "We will accept 65 per cent of the crew, if able seamen, as providing reasonable safety."

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator excuse me for interrupting him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the same requirements are made of able seamen for the crew that are made for able seamen for the lifeboats?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of which bill does the Senator speak?

Mr. SMOOT. Of your substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may just continue the parallel, the bill of the Senate committee does not require that men who are assigned as efficient lifeboat hands shall be able seamen. It requires only that the men shall be efficient lifeboat men before the boat is permitted to sail, and that there shall be two of them to each lifeboat, but it does not require that those men shall have had experience of a day on deck at sea. If before the inspectors in a harbor they have passed an examination in drill work, in swinging out a lifeboat and lowering it, they shall be held to be accepted as efficient lifeboat men.

I take it that almost everybody here has seen on the stage and elsewhere men drilled to the highest proficiency in the manual of arms. It is wonderful to see what they could do. But if you were going to put a regiment in a position where it would be tested to the last limit and where everything depended upon how it should acquit itself, would you take these parade fellows or would you take veterans, men who had smelt powder, men who had seen service on the field?

That illustrates the difference, Mr. President, in the two bills with respect to the efficiency of the seamen. The committee bill provides that if these men can give an exhibition drill in manning lifeboats in harbor in calm water, for that is where it would have to take place, and if they are proficient there, then they are accepted as efficient lifeboat men.

But, oh, how little that tells, Mr. President, as to what they will do in the hour of danger in midocean. But the man who has had three years on deck must have something additional to argue for him. He must have encountered some storms. He at least may have had opportunity to learn to handle the lifeboat in the open sea.

The substitute provides also, Mr. President, that there shall be two of these men for each lifeboat, not that they shall be efficient lifeboat men according to the standard fixed by the reported bill—that is, men who have just passed an examination before the inspectors on what I call a parade drill—but it provides that before the vessel can go out to sea there shall be two men for every lifeboat who are able seamen, who have had three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. In addition, it provides that the inspectors shall put these men to the test and examine them.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator answer one question. He must have misunderstood me. In his substitute the requirement of an able seaman for a lifeboat is named. It is also required that 40 per cent and 50 and 55 per cent and up to 65 per cent of the crew shall be able seamen, but it does not state what shall constitute an able seaman. The reason why I asked the question was to learn from the Senator if the able seaman in one instance is exactly the same as the able seaman in the other, and if the requirements are the same for both.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Precisely. The substitute defines what able seamen shall be, that an able seaman shall be one who has had three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. An able seaman assigned to a lifeboat must have those qualifications. In addition, the substitute provides that he shall pass the required examination, so that the inspector after putting him to the test can satisfy himself of the ability of the applicant to perform this work.

Now, then, returning to the point where I was when I digressed, the substitute requires that 75 per cent of each crew shall be able to understand the language of the officers, so as to comprehend every order; that is, not only the crew on deck, but the crew in every department.

Besides this, if this bill should become a law, in the first year 40 per cent of the crew on deck must be of a rating not less than able seamen; that is, at least 40 per cent of the crew must have had three years at sea on deck or on the Great Lakes, and must be 19 years of age or over. The second year that is increased 5 per cent, and it is increased 5 per cent each year until 65 per cent of the crew on deck shall be able seamen.

The substitute bill provides, in the first place, and the committee bill makes no provision in that respect, that there shall be lifeboats enough to carry at one time all the people on board the vessel.

Then, before the vessel is permitted to go to sea, it shall be ascertained that there are able seamen enough to provide two able seamen for every lifeboat. These men are required to meet the demands of the inspectors as to drill and efficiency, as shown under actual tests required of them before the vessel goes to sea.

Contrast that with the requirements of the committee bill. The committee bill has the same requirement, but with a proviso that if the vessel has one interpreter for every lifeboat the crew can be of men who do not understand the language of the officers.

The committee bill requires only enough able seamen to furnish a lookout and a quartermaster or wheelman. The latter terms are interchangeable. Three watches are required, so that six men in all are required by the committee bill to be able seamen.

But so tender was this committee, Mr. President, of the ship-owners and the steamship companies, so fearful were they that they were imposing too great burdens upon these companies by that requirement, that they provide if the board of inspectors examine these wheelmen and lookouts and say they are competent then the three years' service at sea will be waived, and one year's service at sea or on the Great Lakes is declared to be sufficient to entitle the applicant to a rating as an able seaman. They also waive the limit of 19 years and say that an 18-year-old boy will be accepted. Mr. President, if legislation of that character be enacted, it will not be creditable to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to be able to compare two of the requirements of the substitute bill. I have not enough information of my own to enable me to institute the comparison, and therefore I ask the question. I mean the requirements; first, that there shall be 40 per cent of the deck crew able seamen to begin with; and second, that there shall be enough able seamen to provide two for each lifeboat. My knowledge of the sea is rather limited; but, take a boat that with passengers and crew and everybody will carry 1,500 people. That is a reasonably good-sized boat, but not very large for these days. How many lifeboats would be required on such a boat? Suppose there is no standard either for a lifeboat, but there would be 50 or 60 or 70 lifeboats—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Perhaps it will help to an understanding of the question submitted by the Senator from Iowa to revert to the Titanic. The Titanic had 2,201 people on board. Of that number 885 were crew. She had 14 lifeboats. She had some life rafts and some collapsible lifeboats. These are not standard lifeboats. She had only 14 lifeboats, each capable of carrying 65 people.

If she had been required to have a lifeboat capacity to secure every person accommodation who was on the Titanic at the time she went to the bottom, she would have required only 34 lifeboats. That would have required a deck crew of 68 of the rating of able seamen or higher. The Titanic had at least 8 officers, so that she would only have had to have 60 able seamen in the crew. She had a total crew of 885. Oh, what a small percentage of the total would have manned each lifeboat with 2 able seamen. Does that aid the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; very much. I did not suppose that the ordinary lifeboat, however, was quite so large.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The information as to the size of these lifeboats is from the report of the Senate committee on the Titanic. Perhaps the ordinary lifeboat might be smaller, but the lifeboats of the Titanic held 65.

Mr. CUMMINS. I supposed the ordinary lifeboat would carry about 40 people. I have heard it remarked about the Chamber that there was an inconsistency between the requirement of 40 per cent, to begin with, of able seamen and the requirement of two for each lifeboat. I wanted the Senator from Wisconsin to clear up that question before he left that phase of the subject. That was the reason for my question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment. Let me reply, if the Senator please, first to the Senator from Iowa.

The bill provides that at least 40 per cent for the first year shall be able seamen, and, in entire harmony with that phraseology, it provides that not less than two able seamen shall be shipped for every lifeboat, and that there shall be lifeboats enough for all the crew and all the passengers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the number of the crew of the Titanic?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The crew of the Titanic numbered 885.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had reached the conclusion myself that 40 per cent of the crew would in no case probably be fewer men than two for each lifeboat necessary to carry all the people on board, but there seemed to be some doubt about that in the minds of some Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, of course I am a land-lubber and have to take my tutelage from those men who have been at sea. I never shall be able to express my very great obligation to Andrew Furuseth, who for the last four years has called upon me almost every Sunday morning to talk with me about this legislation. Andrew Furuseth is a sailor. He is a Norwegian Americanized, one of the most intelligent men it has ever been my good fortune to meet. For 19 years he has been sitting up there in that corner of the gallery waiting to be made free. Whatever I happen to know about this subject I have acquired from talking with him. I am confident that the minimum crew of 40 would in practically every case furnish two able seamen for each lifeboat; but, Mr. President, if it did not, the requirement for the two able seamen for each lifeboat would control.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, it depends upon the size of the crew as to a comparison between the two. If you take a ship with a crew of 885, of course 40 per cent would far exceed the requirement for the lifeboats.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if you take a small ship, with a very small crew, the requirement for lifeboats would exceed 40 per cent. As I understand the Senator's substitute, there must be not less than 40 per cent, and there must be not less than two for each lifeboat.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is it; exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. I may misunderstand it, but I was going to ask the Senator if the bill does not provide that there shall be not only two for each lifeboat but that there shall be 40 per cent besides?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not so understand it. I understand that the requirement of two for each lifeboat is absolute and that the 40 per cent requirement is absolute; but if the 40 per cent did not furnish two for each lifeboat, the two for each lifeboat would have to be forthcoming before the vessel would be permitted to sail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if two for each lifeboat did not furnish 40 per cent, the 40 per cent would also have to be forthcoming. It depends altogether upon the point of view. For the Titanic it would require three hundred and fifty-odd able seamen.

Mr. SMOOT. Three hundred and fifty-four.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and only two for each lifeboat.

Mr. SMOOT. The way I construe it, though I may be mistaken, is that it requires two able seamen for each lifeboat and 40 per cent of the crew must be able seamen. That is the reason why I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon of the Senator from Mississippi. The Titanic would not have been required to have had the very large number of able seamen he has mentioned—354, I think—because the provision of this substitute is that the number of able seamen shall be a percentage of the deck crew, not the entire crew. If the percentage of the deck crew be not sufficient to furnish two able seamen or men of higher rating for each lifeboat, it is required that additional able seamen be shipped so as to provide two for each lifeboat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the entire deck crew of the Titanic?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Titanic had a crew of 66 in her deck department. The fireroom and engine-room crews numbered something over 300. Then, of course, there were the stewards, the waiters, and others to the number of over 400.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When you speak of the crew, I take it for granted that you mean the sailormen. When you refer to the waiters, the stewards, and everybody else, of course that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But they are classified as crew.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there were only 66 deck crew, then the 40 per cent would have been only 27 men, or, accurately speaking, it would have been 26.4 men, but as you can not divide a man into tenths you would have to put it at 27. Two for each lifeboat would have required 68, which is more than she had in the deck crew.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but she ought to have had more.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator construe the language which I shall now read as meaning deck crew only? Section 12, on page 17, says:

That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel—

Does the Senator think that that applies only to the deck crew?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the requirement that 75 per cent shall understand English applies to the whole crew and to each department of the crew; but when you come to speak of able seamen, then the provision is limited to the deck crew, and 40 per cent of the deck crew are required to be able seamen the first year.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the section goes on—

nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew—

That is the provision in regard to the number of able seamen required to constitute the deck crew.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That explains it and makes it perfectly clear.

Mr. President, I do not remember at just what point I was interrupted; but, as I now recall, the Senator from Iowa [Mr.

CUMMINS] asked me a question, and I am not certain whether or not I have answered it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator has probably done so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. I wanted to see whether the 40 per cent requirement would really ever be applicable or not. I had an idea that if you required for every boat two able seamen—and I thoroughly agree with that requirement for every lifeboat—and enough lifeboats to carry every soul on board, able seamen generally would constitute more than 40 per cent of the deck crew. I am not familiar enough with the different kinds of boats and the different ways in which they are equipped to have a very clear idea about it, but I was wondering whether the provision of 40 per cent ought not to be increased rather than diminished.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This 40 to 65 per cent provision will be applicable mainly to freight vessels and to vessels carrying a small number of passengers. Now, Mr. President, I will say that when this bill was introduced representing the best judgment of the men who know the sea as we know our law offices it provided that there should be not less than 75 per cent who were able seamen. However, these men have been worn down and discouraged by the delay, opposition, and harassments of a 20 years' contest, so that, in the hope finally of securing freedom, of raising their calling or business somewhat above serfdom, and of protecting their lives at sea and the lives of those for whom they are responsible, in order to get something better than the existing law, they have yielded and cut this percentage down from 75 per cent to 65 per cent, and from 65 per cent to 60 per cent, and from 60 per cent to 55 per cent, and from 55 per cent to 45 per cent, and finally down to 40 per cent, so that this legislation might get by the committees of Congress.

They consented to this, as it was only by agreeing to a low percentage that they could secure a report on some bill in which they could see some hope of relief and get a plank on which they might float while waiting and hoping for something better in the future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Following up the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which I understood to be that the requirement that there should be two able seamen for each lifeboat would exceed the 40 per cent requirement, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether or not, upon vessels like the Titanic or any of the large passenger vessels where the requirements for lifeboats would be very large, it would not be true ordinarily that two men for each lifeboat would exceed 40 per cent, but upon boats which are largely used for freight service, carrying few passengers, the 40 per cent would exceed the two for each lifeboat, and would not that be true very largely in the coastwise service?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, perhaps, that might be true in the coastwise service, except on vessels carrying a large number of passengers. In the ocean service on the large passenger steamships I am quite sure that, starting with 40 per cent, you would not have enough men to equip the lifeboats; but, of course, the lifeboat provision here is absolute and controlling, and would provide a sufficient number. In the case of the Titanic there were just 66 in the deck department. It would have required 2 more—68—if they had been able seamen, to have had a number sufficient to have manned 34 lifeboats; and 34 lifeboats would have carried all the passengers and all the crew on that ill-fated vessel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Lifeboats carrying 65 passengers each are very large lifeboats.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir; I suppose they were very large. I have noticed that in some cases more than 65 people were safely taken away on lifeboats.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were crowded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; that is true. The Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Utah, however, will understand how it happens that the able-seamen requirement of the substitute has finally been cut down to 40 per cent for the first year. It did not start that way, and that does not express the judgment of Mr. Furuseth and of the men who have really given their lives to working out along this line something for the betterment of the sailors and at the same time for the greater safety of the people of this country; but this bill was the best they could hope to secure.

I have done a good deal of work on this subject. I have read almost everything I could get hold of that pertained to it, besides spending a great deal of time with Mr. Furuseth. The substitute does not go so far as I think public safety requires, but I have offered it in this form simply because committees in the other House have reported it and it has passed in this form. We should understand how difficult it is to secure legislation and to have the minds of two great legislative bodies agree upon the details of legislation. We know the value of having a bill which has been accepted by one House. This bill in substantially this form has been accepted in the other House. I have added a few things to it. I have added the lifeboat provision. I think it ought to be in the bill and that it will be accepted; I do not believe that provision will endanger the bill. I have added to it two provisions of minor importance which have been recommended by the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor, which I think will create no trouble; but otherwise I have taken the bill just as it passed the House two years ago. I have offered it simply because the enactment of this legislation should not be delayed one moment longer for any reason. We can not hold it up any longer without assuming responsibility for whatever may happen to-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow.

Mr. President, I have stated the requirements of an efficient equipment under the substitute bill. I had given part of the requirements of an efficient equipment under the committee bill when I was diverted by a question and I now return to that subject.

I have commented on the effect of having to pass in an hour of supreme danger the orders of the man on the bridge through an interpreter to those who are to man the lifeboats. Mr. President, just think of it; in a lifeboat, perhaps one into which, say, your daughter or your son is to go, you can not go with them; the conditions may be such that they must go alone, with the fury of an ocean storm all about them, with the vessel every moment settling lower and lower; they must go over the side into a lifeboat in the crew of which there is a Turk, a Chinese, a Jap, a Greek, a negro from South Africa, a Hungarian, and an Arabian. Under the committee bill there will be two of what are called efficient lifeboat men, not men who are able seamen, not men experienced at sea, but men who have passed the drills; one man in the boat who can interpret between the commanding officer and all the languages represented there. Some of them may understand, to some of them it may be gibberish, for all the interpreter has to do is to pass the scrutiny of the inspector.

The lowering of that lifeboat, an act requiring the greatest skill, the greatest knowledge of the sea, is in the hands, under the Senate committee bill, of two men, not able seamen, but who may be from the saloon or the fireroom, but who have been certified as efficient lifeboat men, one in the bow and one in the stern, holding the tackle. The remainder of the boat crew need not have any training; they may be waiters from the saloon. These may have 65 or 70 souls committed to their keeping. They are being lowered away under orders from the deck which none but the interpreter can understand, excepting when the order is translated as many times as there are languages represented in the lifeboat crew. What do you think about that?

Let me ask the Senator from Mississippi, suppose he had a boat of that kind on one side of the vessel, and on the other side of the vessel you had a boat manned by two able seamen, two men who had had three years at sea, and a crew who understood the language of the officers, which would he prefer? Under the substitute you would surely have that many able seamen in the boat and there would be a chance of having others, because there is provided in the substitute bill a standard of efficiency which requires at least two able seamen for every lifeboat. There is then a possibility of there being a man down in the engine room who has been at sea and who has acquired some knowledge of the sea. There may be also more men in the lifeboat having knowledge of the sea, but you are sure of the two—the man at the helm and the man at the bow. I am told that in a lifeboat those are the vital places. The ropes must be released just right; the boat must be lowered to meet the sea at the critical moment. This means life or death. Boats were crushed against the side of the Volturmo; boats were swept down under the stern of the Volturmo and never appeared again.

You can lower away a boat in a very high gale, and if you strike the water at just the time that judgment and experience and intelligence will tell you is the proper moment, you drop it in a comparative calm; you drop it at a time when you catch the wash just right, and the boat does not crash against the side of the vessel and crumple like an eggshell; she goes where she should go; she gets away.

I spoke here the other day of the way of the sea, something which has been impressed upon me again and again in talks with Mr. Furuseth. That is the reason why it means everything to have able seamen on deck. Men never can become able seamen by remaining in the engine room. Take the deck crew of the Titanic. How many men were there? That was a modern steamer, but there were only 66 men in the deck department, 325 men in the engine department, and 494—nearly 500—men in the victualing department. Those men never had an opportunity, unless they acquired it before they went on that vessel, of knowing anything about the sea. You have to look the sea in the face to know it; you have to study the sea and the sky together to know the sea; you have to observe the sea in all her moods to know the sea and to know how to grapple and wrestle with and overcome her.

Take a vessel manned by men who know the sea. She throws her head up to the coming storm; she meets every mass of water hurled at her as does the fencer in the arena the thrusts of his adversary. She has been warned, if she is in charge of able seamen, of the coming of the storm. Their weather-beaten faces have been turned skyward; they know the sea; they know the sky; and when the hour comes that in all its fury the raging storm breaks, their boat is prepared for it. Stripped like an athlete, she turns to meet it. Every man, too, is at his place and sure of himself. They are able seamen; they are not landlubbers; they are not afraid, and, oh, what their confidence is to the whole mass of humanity on the vessel! If there should come something unforeseen, perhaps some vessel in the same lane of travel driven by the storm, not obeying the rules that should control all sea travel, and it meets and wounds her to death, the perfectly managed and perfectly officered and manned vessel, when that hour comes, is prepared and cares not only for its crew, but for all intrusted to their keeping. How important, then, it is that there should be confidence on the part of all on board in the officers who understand their business and in the men who understand the officers and execute instantly every order issued; and prompt obedience to orders sometimes settles the fate of a vessel and decides the whole issue.

Mr. President, it seems like an insult to the intelligence of the Senate and trifling with a great piece of legislation to stand here and argue for things that are so manifestly right and against things that are so manifestly wrong. Travel on a well-officered vessel, manned by able seamen, with lifeboats to bear all on board, should be as safe as travel on land.

It will do us no good, Mr. President, so to equip, so to man, and so to regulate our merchant marine if all the craft that we meet on the watery way shall be undermanned, controlled by ignorance, and sailed by the very lowest element in all humanity. So the substitute goes to the extent of providing that all foreign vessels which operate to our ports must also meet the requirements imposed by the bill. As well might you enact nothing as to leave that out. One-tenth of the commerce which we have with the world is carried on in American vessels; 90 per cent of it in foreign vessels. If you do not extend the same requirements imposed upon American merchant marine to foreign vessels in our ports, you might as well prepare to see that one-tenth disappear. To put our shipping on an even keel and level with the foreign competitor the foreigner must be required to conform to the restrictions imposed upon our own ships when he leaves American ports. He bids against them in the carrying of freight from our ports. Then let him man his vessel just as we require our vessels to be manned. So it is provided in the substitute that it shall apply, as it should apply, to all foreign vessels in our ports.

Our Supreme Court has settled the question, as will be found in One hundred and ninetieth Supreme Court Reports, that we have the absolute authority to prescribe the conditions upon which foreign vessels may sail from our ports. In that opinion the court referred to the fact that nearly all the legislation that aims to improve the conditions of the American seamen would be utterly futile and would be prejudicial to the American merchant marine if foreign vessels trading in our ports were not required to meet exactly the same conditions.

Mr. President, I have very imperfectly presented the two bills, and have only touched upon one or two paragraphs of them; but I went to that which to me seemed to be the part most important to be considered.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Florida. He rose to ask me a question some time ago. If it is not too late, I shall be very glad to yield to him.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not care to interrupt the Senator now. I think the matter has been sufficiently covered in his discussion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if there is any discussion in opposition, I will not say necessarily to the substitute, but to any legislation at this time, I apprehend it will come from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and that in part, at least, or to begin with, it will be the presentation of an objection to taking up this subject at all at this time in view of the proposed international maritime conference. I judge that from some observations he submitted on Wednesday or Thursday of last week.

I do not know that I care to say very much, if anything, about that matter at this time. I believe, in view of the situation as it exists to-day, this Government of ours should not wait upon anybody to mark out a line of policy for us to follow. Some things are so plain, and they are the things that are set out in this bill, that I believe there is no warrant whatever for asking for any postponement of legislation on the subjects covered in the bill as reported and in the substitute.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to say that I am very much interested in this matter. I have received some letters asking that action be deferred until the action of an international conference. I am frank to say that I do not know when that international conference is expected to be held.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In November.

Mr. BURTON. The 12th of November.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator that it begins on the 12th of November.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And there is no knowing when it will end.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is no knowing anything about how long it will last. It may last a month.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It may last a year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may be adjourned. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that it seems to have come out of the Titanic disaster. The proposal to hold the conference followed the Titanic disaster.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Action on this bill, I presume, could not in anywise prejudice the result of the conference that might be held in November?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think it could. Indeed, I think the enactment of this legislation might be helpful in that conference. There are a few standards that I think are so plain and so right that we should set them up without consulting anybody on earth. One is that the sailors shall be free. If our representatives in that meeting can go into it saying that the Senate of the United States, one branch of Congress, has at least declared for emancipating from slavery the men on the sea, perhaps that will help somewhat to lift up the other countries to that level.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say that I am very much in sympathy with that view. My own judgment is that it could not retard the betterment of the situation, and that it would be at least a step in the right direction to pass the bill at this time. I shall vote for the bill with a very great deal of relish and earnestness.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in 1894 the British Parliament appointed what they called a commission to investigate conditions pertaining to the British merchant marine. I believe, strictly speaking, the act provided that the board of trade should appoint a committee. In my reading on that subject I find that Mr. Bryce presided over some of the meetings of the board of trade that appointed the committee that made this investigation. It was in many ways a remarkable investigation. The commission consisted of 14 men. Some of them were members of Parliament; some of them were shipowners. The commission was a very high-class one. They spent two years, down to 1896, in investigating conditions, the troubles and the deterioration that had befallen the merchant marine of Great Britain. After two years of very careful investigation they made a most valuable report.

Perhaps at some later time, if this discussion is at all extended, I shall wish to call the attention of the Senate to that report. It is very enlightening and instructive. It shows the same struggle over there that we have had here. It shows the control of legislation by the shipowners. It deals with the question of insurance. There has been going on, of course, for decades and decades a system of insuring vessels and sending them to sea, with the seamen on board, to go to the bottom. That is what has been going on. Books have been written upon it. Investigations have been had, the reading of which would chill your blood.

The same influences which have controlled legislation in the United States Congress for 20 years, holding back everything here that was in the public interest, have to a large extent controlled legislation in every maritime country. The recommendations made by the British commission after an investigation of two years have been only very partially carried out. Yet they were so plainly right and in accord with all of the intelligent findings of every Government on earth that has investigated the subject that you marvel that it has been in anybody's power to resist and prevent their enactment into law.

I adverted to this commission at this time for just one reason. The commission of 1894, which reported in 1896, made certain very strong recommendations. I shall not detain the Senate to refer to these now. If it becomes necessary in the debate later, I shall do so. One of those recommendations, however, is as follows:

We think it very desirable that Her Majesty's Government should take steps to invite the cooperation of maritime States to consider how far it may be possible to agree with them on identical rules for the manning of merchant vessels, and the steps to be mutually taken for enforcing such regulations.

Now, here is the point:

But we are of opinion that there should be no delay in putting a manning scheme into practice by reason of inviting such cooperation.

You may invite the foreign powers to meet us to consider what may be done better to save life at sea, but in the meantime uncertain as to what the outcome may be. We know perfectly well that out of 14 Governments represented the views of many must be very different from the views of this country, the most enlightened and progressive country on the face of the earth. We know that what comes out of that sort of a conference must be a general average, a leveling up and a leveling down. While our and other people perish at sea, shall this progressive and enlightened country wait for the report of this conference, which may sit next month and adjourn and sit again and adjourn, and which at best will arrive at some conclusion that will be a compromise?

On the great essentials embodied in this legislation let us plant the American standard on high, safe, secure ground that shall commend us to all the people of the world as an enlightened, humane, courageous, liberty-loving nation.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the hour is rather late, and I should prefer to proceed to-morrow with the body of my argument.

I shall wish to take up, in the first place, the great advance which has been made in the last three years in provisions for safety at sea. A general impression prevails that prior to the Titanic disaster and even since that day the American Congress and its executive officers have neglected their duty in that regard. I shall point out, by specific statutes and conventions, that such has not been the case.

In the next place, I shall seek to show that this bill touches but one phase of safety at sea—a very important and essential one—but that it by no means includes the whole of the subject, nor does it pertain to the safeguards that are the most pressing.

In the next place, I shall endeavor to show that at least some of the provisions of the proposed amendment, notwithstanding they have been advocated so earnestly and so sincerely by the Senator from Wisconsin, instead of adding to safety would diminish safety.

There are one or two points, however, that I wish to take up to-night, particularly since a considerable number of questions were asked in regard to them. One of them is as to the proportion between the number of able seamen required to man lifeboats under the proposed bill and the number provided by the requirement of 40 per cent the first year, 45 per cent the second year, 50 per cent the third year, 55 per cent the fourth year, and thereafter 65 per cent.

Let us begin, in the first place, with the greatest ship that floats, the Imperator.

She carries 80 lifeboats, having about the maximum capacity for carriage that is safe, about 60 each, making 4,800. It was stated in the newspapers that on a recent voyage she brought over 5,000 persons from the Old World. Two able seamen to each of those lifeboats would make a total of 160. Her deck crew is composed of 70 men—40 able seamen, 18 ordinary seamen, and 12 so-called boys. They call them boys if they have served less than a year, even though they be 23, 24, or 25 years of age. So it would be necessary for that vessel to carry 120 additional able seamen for the mere sake of complying with the provisions of this bill.

It is far from me to say that such a vessel ought not to have plenty of able boatmen on board. I shall to-morrow go more fully into a subject about which I trust Members of the Senate will reflect, namely, that the seaman of to-day has entirely different functions and is a very different kind of man from the seaman of the days of the old sailing ship. Then he had to climb the masts, to raise and lower the sails, and to provide for the unforeseen emergencies of the sea, with its frightful storms. He manned the clipper ship, and our American sailors were the best on the seas. They were necessarily men possessed of great physical strength, of agility, of skill. But to-day the whole situation has changed.

The modern steamship is a great piece of mechanism, a colossal structure, propelled not by sails but by steam, and the greatest amount of labor in the way of propulsion is the feeding of coal into the furnace or the pumping of oil. What is left for the sailor? To close the hatches, to wash the decks, to polish the brasses, to throw out lines when approaching a dock, although in large part that is done by machinery. If there is one of exceptional brightness, he keeps track of the log at the taffrail, as it is called. There is no more similarity between the duties of a sailor on a sailing ship and a deck hand on a modern steamer than there would be between two vitally different occupations.

I shall not for a moment decry the importance of these positions, nor would I wish in any way to disparage the hardships to which the sailor is subjected; but his position is entirely different from that of old. It gives him no special skill in the handling of lifeboats. In the hearings before our committee, which continued for some five or six weeks, there was one old sea captain who said: "I went 13 times around the Horn, and I never knew a case of the lowering of the lifeboats at any time."

Why, here in the instance of the Grosser Kurfurst, what happened? When the Volturmo was on fire there were vessels gathering around there from all points of the compass, all terrorized at the prospect, and all seeking to lower boats. The captain of the Grosser Kurfurst called for men who would volunteer to go down in the boats in that terrible raging sea. As one man, to their credit be it said, they rose up and volunteered. The captain had the whole crew to choose from. Whom did he choose? There were two men from the steward's department, one man from the scullery department, one coal passer, and one man, I believe, who fed the fires.

He picked out those as the best men he had on the vessel; and in the face of the terrible sea they lowered the boat, and—praise and blessing be upon them—they saved 21 lives at the very beginning. That which had been given up as impossible with a slight abatement in the sea they found possible. These stewards, these coal passers, these men who are spoken of with so much contempt are the men who handled that boat and put it over.

Why, it is not so much rowing that is needed; it is handling the mechanism, taking off the davits, seeing that the boat shall be lowered without one side going below the other. In handling the boats on a steamer it is mechanical ingenuity that is required quite as much as seamanship.

Mr. President, I shall go into this subject much more fully when the Senate is perhaps more disposed to listen and to take up the question and when there is a larger attendance of Senators.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to know if the Senator has any information as to the character of the men that were on deck in this ship that went down? He speaks of the men being selected from down in the ship. Has he any information as to the character of the sailors who were on deck and whether or not they were able seamen?

Mr. BURTON. I have no doubt there were about the ordinary number of able seamen. On a vessel of that kind, belonging to a standard line like the North German Lloyd, it would be impossible that the crew should fall below the average. It no doubt would have a considerable number of able seamen among the others.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As perhaps throwing a little bit of light on that subject, I have here a letter which, with the indulgence of the Senator, I will read.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This letter is from Mr. Gus Braun. He is a Swedish sailor, an able seaman of 12 or 15 years' standing. He sailed as quartermaster on the ocean for years, and as wheelsman on the Great Lakes. He is now the agent of the Eastern and Gulf Sailors' Association. It is his duty, in part, to give protection to sailors and to aid them in securing employment.

Immediately after the Volturmo disaster was reported I asked Mr. Furuseth to communicate with some one in New York and have him in waiting, as soon as any of the rescued people landed in New York, to ascertain the conditions upon the Volturmo, the sort of seamanship there was there, and particularly to interview any of the sailors, if any would be willing to give statements. On October 18 Mr. Braun wrote this letter to Mr. Furuseth which I now read:

MY DEAR FURUSETH: Your letter received. In regard to the first, I may say that I tried very hard to get the carpenter, boatswain, one sailor, and one of the stokers to give a statement as to the way the lifeboats were handled during the disaster. These men all agreed that there was not enough efficient men aboard to man the boats.

I take it, from the fact that he did not send their statements, that they were not willing to take the chances that would go with making a formal statement of that sort, as affecting their service in the future.

He proceeds to say:

The Volturmo carried 8 able seamen, — ordinary, 4 quartermasters, 2 boatswains, and 2 carpenters. Nineteen lifeboats were carried in double rows on the top deck. One half of the deck crew were burned to death; they never had a chance to escape. The other half were fighting the fire in No. 1 hold. The firemen were kept in the stokehold keeping up steam and fighting the fire in the bunkers. The heat was terrific, and all the firemen took turns about of 15 minutes each at their posts. The steward's department was left to handle the lifeboats and the passengers—with the result that you have heard about. Only one boat got away, the one the second mate was in charge of, and manned by two A. B.'s, one fireman, and the steward.

That is the reason why some of the results were just as they were, I think.

The steward's department consisted of men with hardly any experience at all, and unable to speak and understand the English language. Two or three men of the stokehold crew knew how to handle boats. The boat drill on the previous Saturday, the only one they had, merely amounted to showing the men their stations; no boats were swung out; none were lowered. At the time of the accident the wind was blowing 40 to 45 miles an hour.

Yours, fraternally,

GUS BRAUN.

Mr. BURTON. I have no variance with the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the boat drills, the competency of the men, or the number of them. What I maintain is that the fact that a man has served three years at sea—he may be halt, he may be blind in one eye, he may be otherwise deficient—is no qualification over another man, very likely of better physique, to handle boats and lower them.

Another point I wish to make, in response to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, is this: I do not know the facts in regard to what the men were or how many able seamen there were; there may be some way of contradicting or confirming that; but I do not believe a lifeboat can be fairly tested when there is a 40 or 45-mile-an-hour gale. I doubt whether any man could get down a lifeboat and make it useful at such a time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, Mr. President, a wind of 40 or 45 miles an hour does not begin to be a gale. There ought to be no difficulty at all in lowering lifeboats with a 40 or 45-mile-an-hour wind if the men have had any experience whatever. That is the information I have.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator had ever been out in a gale of that kind, with the resulting rough sea, I do not believe he would make that statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is where the Senator from Ohio differs from Mr. Furuseth, who has been out in gales that neither of us would dare look in the face.

Mr. BURTON. I do not like to contradict anyone, Mr. Furuseth or anyone else, but do not try any experiments in a 40-mile-an-hour or a 45-mile-an-hour gale, and pray Heaven that if you go on an ocean voyage your vessel will not be shipwrecked by encountering such a gale as that.

Mr. President, there is one other thing that I want to speak of at this time, and that is this international maritime conference. I do not quite see how we can maintain national faith after having invited this conference ourselves; after we have chosen our delegates; after the propositions presented have been formulated; after all plans have been made for the meeting at London on the 12th of next month. Among the different subjects to be considered are the very things treated in this bill, the manning of boats, the efficiency of crews—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. A number of these subjects will, no doubt, come up.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BURTON. All right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will recall, and I can put my hand on it in a moment, the letter issued by the Commissioner of Navigation indicating the subjects that are to come up at that time, and he says the only one touched by any provision of this bill is efficiency; and all he says about that in his letter is that if practicable they will possibly consider that question.

Mr. BURTON. If practicable? The efficiency of officers and crews is included in the propositions formulated. I want to say in this connection, since the question has been raised, that it very much inures to the credit of our Bureau of Navigation and to our Department of Commerce that, before the Volturno fire, suggestions were made from that bureau that the subject of prevention of fire be considered at that conference which is to be held. So we at least have this record that we did not wait for the catastrophe to occur before we suggested that as one of the propositions to be considered.

There is a great deal in the two bills, and I am talking a little longer than I intended to do; but just one word more. I am telling no secret when I state that very strenuous protests have been received from at least three of the leading maritime nations against the adoption of any legislation here before that conference is held, on the ground that it would prejudice the very questions that are to be considered by the conferees. The conference indeed is not limited to any set program. It can take up any subject.

There are some things that we are going to insist on there. It is proper that I should speak of it right now. One of them is the abolition of arrests for desertion. The delegates from the United States would certainly insist upon that. But it is much better for us to secure the abolition of such arrest, which we abolished in the domestic trade in 1893, in an orderly and regular way.

I shall later call attention to the fact that the substitute bill contains a number of provisions which contravene our treaties; for instance, the one making it compulsory in an American port for the payment of wages to seamen employed on foreign vessels. Another relates to giving our courts jurisdiction over claims by foreign seamen against foreign ships. One of the latest treaties on that subject is with Sweden. It is perhaps hardly necessary for me to read it in full; it is the general international law:

The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls general, vice consuls, deputy consuls general, deputy consuls, and consular agents shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of any difference which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captain, officers, and crews, without exception, particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not interfere except when the disorder that has arisen is of such a nature as to disturb tranquillity and public order—on shore or in the port, or when a person of the country or not belonging to the crew shall be concerned therein.

That is the general rule—

In all other cases the aforesaid authorities—

That is, local authorities, such as our authorities in New York or Boston—shall confine themselves to lending aid to the said consular officers, if they are requested by them to do so, in causing the arrest and imprisonment of any person whose name is inscribed on the crew list whenever for any cause the said officers shall think proper.

The same thing applies to the manning of ships, their crews. That is primarily a question for the country of the flag which the ship carries. Our treaties secure that, and it is a question of international law. But, of course, I do not mean to say that we can not provide that certain equipment shall be provided, not only in machinery but in the number of men, but I do think we ought not to do it until that time.

Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the routine business, I shall proceed to address the Senate on the pending bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it the desire, I will inquire, to have an executive session to-night?

Mr. BACON. That is the purpose; but two Senators have indicated a desire to occupy a moment, and I will yield to them before making the motion.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on the 7th of this month I had incorporated into the Record a short excerpt from the prison report of the parole clerk of the State prison of Arizona. There has been such a wide demand for the publication I ask unanimous consent that the report printed in the Record may be printed as a public document. I had an investigation and an estimate made of the expense, and it will cost about $20 to print it as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 215.)

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the request made by the Senator from Arizona, only I think it is proper to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the unfinished business ought to be temporarily laid aside before any other business is done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] be exempted from the order to telegraph Senators requesting their presence here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BACON. There are other Senators; for instance, I know the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] ought not to be included; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] ought not to be included; and I would suppose—

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not know of those cases and I would be glad to include them in my motion.

Mr. BACON. There may be others.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I suggest that the Senator from Texas include any Senator who is absent on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to inform the Senate that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is engaged in a matter which makes it impossible that he should return within the time indicated. I should like to have him also included in the list of those excepted.

Mr. SMOOT. I think when the telegrams are sent each Senator will use his own judgment as to whether he should return. I do not think there need be any exclusions. Let the telegrams be sent in such a way as to indicate that the presence of Senators is desired here, and a Senator will have to use his own personal judgment as to whether he can come or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The telegram is not compulsory, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. The telegram will not be compulsory. Every Senator here knows that it is impossible for the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to be here, and almost everyone in the United States knows it. The order will not be mandatory. It will simply suggest that the presence of Senators is desired.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest that if a Senator has any excuse for not returning, that excuse will be submitted to the Senate by telegraph and the Senate can pass upon it then. Of course, the Senators referred to by the Senator from Texas, who are known to be ill, might be exempt from the order, but I think it is very well that the telegrams should be sent, and if the Senator from Kansas or any other Senator finds it impossible to return at once he will make that fact known to the Senate and the Senate, I am sure, will excuse him for not returning.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the nature of the telegrams? I did not hear the details. If the telegram is a mere suggestion to return, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Utah that a Senator conscious of his duty here will return unless he is compelled to remain away.

I received a message from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] stating that for a very intimate reason he has been called to the defense of a man on trial for his life, and the trial having begun, it is impossible for him to leave the case. Unless the telegram carries the suggestion that a Senator would be in contempt of the Senate if he did not come, the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is all right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The direction that the telegrams be sent by the Sergeant at Arms was made, I believe, on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proceeding for the benefit of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to notify by telegram all absent Senators to return immediately and attend upon the sessions of the Senate. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think, in view of that language, I am justified in making the motion I have submitted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I happened to be in the chair when the motion was made. The language is not quoted exactly. It ought to read that absent Senators be requested to return. I do not think the word "request" is used there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no information except what appears in the Record.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The language used was the language that is employed in the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas move to reconsider the vote by which the order was adopted?

Mr. BACON. I suggest as a shorter method that by unanimous consent the word "requested" be inserted. That is what the Senator from Wisconsin says he intended.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is what I said.

Mr. BACON. That will put every Senator upon his obligation to return unless there is some good reason which he will give to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the telegrams have already been sent to all absent Senators in pursuance of the order adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, we might wait.

Mr. BACON. I think, so far as the Senators mentioned by the Senator from Texas are concerned, and others, of course, if there are reasons which are controlling with them they will not come; and if the occasion will demand it they will submit to the Senate their excuses and the Senate will be in a position to judge whether or not they are proper excuses.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of the discussion brought out by my motion, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Texas is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 22, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate October 21, 1913.

APPOINTMENT IN THE NAVY.

Joseph B. Greene, of North Carolina, to be an assistant surgeon in the Medical Reserve Corps of the Navy from the 15th day of October, 1913.

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

W. K. Kenan to be postmaster at Geneva, Ala., in place of Ida O. Tillman, removed.

ARKANSAS.

C. A. Harris to be postmaster at Junction City, Ark., in place of Charles L. Jones, removed.

J. E. Leeper to be postmaster at Dermott, Ark., in place of Ruby Jones, resigned.

CALIFORNIA.

Charles W. Fay to be postmaster at San Francisco, Cal., in place of Arthur G. Fisk, resigned.

CONNECTICUT.

Dennis C. Murphy to be postmaster at Taftville, Conn., in place of James Graham, removed.

Patrick T. Oates to be postmaster at Saugatuck, Conn., in place of Joseph Morton, resigned.

FLORIDA.

Samuel Bass to be postmaster at Glen St. Mary, Fla. Office became presidential October 1, 1913.

J. B. Griffin to be postmaster at Greenville, Fla. Office became presidential October 1, 1913.

GEORGIA.

Emmett M. Anderson to be postmaster at Statesboro, Ga., in place of William H. Blitch. Incumbent's commission expired July 20, 1913.

ILLINOIS.

Walter R. Lovett to be postmaster at Onarga, Ill., in place of George R. Palmer, resigned.

Jacob Sand to be postmaster at Roanoke, Ill., in place of Benjamin W. Belsley, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 21, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art everywhere present, unseen, yet a potent factor in shaping and guiding the affairs of men and of nations, make us conscious of Thy presence and susceptible to Thy holy influence, that as individuals and as a nation we may render unto Thee and unto our fellow men faithful service now and always, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, proceeding under unanimous consent, I ask that the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk, from the President of the United States, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 20, 1913.

HON. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. UNDERWOOD: Last week you called upon me and, in view of the very natural desire of the Members of the House of Representatives to know why it seemed necessary to keep them continuously in Washington and when they might expect to be free to go home, if only for a brief interval of adjournment, asked me what I thought the prospects were with regard to the banking and currency bill in the Senate. As I then promised you, I have had conferences with members of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, both Democrats and Republicans. As a result of those conferences I feel confident that a report on the bill may be expected not later than the first week in November. Most of the members of the committee with whom I have conferred have shown themselves keenly aware of the disadvantage to the country of any unnecessary delay. I believe that the action of the Senate upon the bill will follow within two or at the most three weeks after the report is made. I do not believe that there will be any attempt to delay its passage by dilatory tactics. Senators on both sides realize that the business of the country awaits this legislation, impatient of being kept in suspense, and display a most public-spirited desire to dispose of it promptly. The passage of the bill is assured.

In these circumstances I should like to confer with you, as you so kindly suggested, as to the action the House should take while awaiting the result.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House that the President is very anxious that action should be taken on the currency bill before an adjournment of Congress is reached. He tells me that he has reason to be hopeful that that result will be accomplished. He also states that there is no desire on his part to interfere with the Members of this House returning home or the House taking a recess until the currency bill comes back from the Senate. I have been unable to reach an agreement with my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in reference to a recess. Of course it is recognized that without a quorum being present we can take no action on this matter unless it is practically done by unanimous consent. More than that, after inquiry I have reached the conclusion that the Senate would not agree to a concurrent resolution allowing the House to take a recess at this time. Therefore that is impracticable; but, as I stated the other day, there is no further business for the House to transact, and as there is no desire on the part of the administration to push business in the House at this time, but a desire that Congress shall remain in session until the currency bill comes back, there is but one method that we can pursue, and that is to adjourn from day to day and allow those Members to go home who desire to do so, who undoubtedly can go home without criticism on account of their absence.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that Members who go home will find that they will be criticized both here and at home. I notice what the President has said in this letter, which has just been read, that he has conferred with members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, both Democratic members and Republican members, using the plural. I think the President gives a very erroneous impression by stating that he has conferred with Republican members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Anyone would suppose from that that he had talked to at least two Republican members of that committee. The President is usually very careful and accurate in his use of the English language. My information is that he has talked with only one Republican member of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, and has no authority for the assurance that he has from any conversation had with that one member.

The President apparently stakes his judgment on the proposition that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate will report the currency bill back to the Senate by the first week in November, and will dispose of the bill in the Senate within three weeks. I am willing to stake my legislative judgment for all time upon the proposition that the banking and currency bill will not be disposed of in the Senate during the month of November nor during the month of December. With all parties desiring banking and currency legislation, and apparently with the present knowledge that the bill as it passed the House, if enacted into law in its present shape, would produce a financial panic and chaos such as this country has never before seen, it would seem desirable to make such changes in the bill as would do benefit rather than injury to the country. That will not be done at a moment's notice or without consideration. If the President desires Congress to remain in session, there is but one thing for us to do. As long as the majority side of the House is unwilling to act upon its own judgment, but prefers to follow the directions of the President, if Congress is to remain here, then it ought to remain here and do business. We ought to "fish or cut bait," to use an old expression. With the program before us, as stated by the newspapers, in reference to legislation during next winter, unless we proceed to business both in committees and in the House we will not get away from here next year until September or October. By that time my distinguished friend from Alabama will probably have left the House and gone to a less important forum of legislation. [Applause.] The rest of us are interested in having Congress proceed. A vast amount of legislation is proposed. The committees ought to be at work reporting that legislation to the House. The House ought to go to work in disposing of it. With the appropriation bills sure to receive some lengthy consideration next winter, we ought either to adjourn and get the rest that we need so that we could stay here late next year, or else we ought to go to work. Members think they can excuse themselves in their districts for being at home while Congress is remaining in session, because the President directs the Democratic majority to stay here. Well, they can take that chance. As far as I am concerned I am willing to stay here and do business, but I am not willing to take a recess to come back in the middle of November when everybody knows that if the House comes here at that time it would be of no avail, and if meanwhile an arrangement could be made in the Senate by unanimous consent that the currency bill shall be set down as the unfinished business to be followed continuously until it is disposed of, then Congress could not adjourn when the House was in recess. I prefer to take no chances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that of course I realize the uncertainty that follows any piece of legislation that is pending in the United States Senate while there is not a cloture rule, and that no man can predict with any certainty what will happen. I feel that it is the duty of this side of the House to sustain the President of the United States, the leader of our party, in his efforts to secure the passage of this currency legislation that not only meets with his approval but is a bill that was created by this side of the Chamber, many gentlemen on that side concurring with them. It is our legislation and we are responsible to the country for it. I feel it is necessary that we should have good currency legislation for the business interests of the country, and that the sooner it goes on the statute books the sooner business prosperity will respond to that legislation. Therefore I am anxious that the House should stay here in session, or nominal session, and sustain the President in his efforts to secure the speedy enactment of this legislation; but at the same time I realize that the membership of this House have been here for nearly a year. They have not been home; they are worn out, and a 30 days' recess would put them in far better condition to attend to business next winter than if we stay here and grind continuously now. For that reason I would like to secure an arrangement by which the membership of the House could take a partial recess at least, one that would enable them to go home and get rested while we were waiting upon the Senate to act, and I would like to ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] again if he is not willing to enter into a pact to allow the House to adjourn three days at a time for a couple of weeks and see what will be the result in the Senate?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have been no longer in session than has the Senate, and my friend from Alabama says that he knows the Members of the House would be able to do business better, more intelligently, and probably quicker next winter if we get a recess now. Now, there is no superiority in the form of human beings in the Senate over the House. If that is true as to the Members of the House, it is equally true as to the Members of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senate has the legislation and evidence no desire to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. The Senate has not a quorum present, the same situation that the House is in. It was without a quorum yesterday, is without a quorum to-day in the city, and probably will be without a quorum to-morrow.

And everybody knows, except the President, that the Senate is not going to dispose of the currency bill in November, and if we need the rest they need the rest over there. If we stay here, I want the House to do business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is evident, I will say to my friend from Illinois, that the House can not do business now. A quorum is not here.

Mr. MANN. If we stay here, some day this side of the House will catch that side of the House napping and send out for Members and bring them back. We have the chance, and we will do it.

EXTENSION OF TIME ON DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] rise?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would like to be heard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Public Lands from further consideration of the bill S. 1673, which is strictly an emergency measure. I will say that this bill was introduced in the Senate on the 22d day of August, went to the Public Lands Committee there, was considered as an emergency measure, and they reported it back, and it passed the Senate on the 27th day of August. But, owing to conditions, we have not been able to get it up here before now, and I would like to have unanimous consent to consider it at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that I had a talk with the gentleman before coming on the floor, and I understand the purpose of this bill is merely to extend the time on which certain desert-land entrymen can perfect their entries, and that their delay in perfecting their entries has been caused by the delay on certain irrigation work of the United States Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is practically the case, with the exception that this was private and not Government work. I will say that the Sixty-second Congress passed a bill for the relief of this kind of cases, and they used the word "construction," just the same as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did now, and made no allowance in case any emergency should arise that would stop operation. In this particular case the construction of the dam was completed, but the people had built extravagantly and were badly in debt, and it went into the hands of a receiver. Through no fault of the settlers, it has not been operated, and the law we passed in the last Congress did not cover the case of operation, and we simply want to get into this law the word "operation."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, as I understand it, this bill gives these settlers no more rights than they have heretofore had, except to extend the time on which they may perfect their entries?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; and just the same as the law in the Sixty-second Congress did.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And if it is not passed at this time, some of the rights will be forfeited?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Some of them will expire in a very short time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Public Lands from further consideration of the bill S. 1673 and asks for the present consideration thereof. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1673) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extensions of time within which to comply with the law and make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Grant and Franklin, State of Washington.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant to any entryman under the desert-land laws in the counties of Grant and Franklin, in the State of Washington, a further extension of time within which he is required to comply with the law and make final proof: Provided, That such entryman shall, by his corroborated affidavit, filed in the land office of the district where such land is located, show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that because of unavoidable delay in the construction and operation of irrigation works intended to convey water to the land embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said lands as required by law within the time limited therefor; but such extension shall not be granted for a period of more than three years, and this act shall not affect contracts initiated for a valid existing reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, which I will not do, I want to say that the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member, has no objection to being discharged from the further consideration of this bill. I was authorized by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], to say that he hoped the bill would receive prompt consideration by the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the gentleman looked into the details of this bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. And into the provisions of the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. The only difference in this bill and the law as it stands to-day are the words "and operation." The situation is this: These irrigation works were built by a private company. The law says that an entryman who is unable to get water by failure of construction on the part of any company, and through no fault of his own, may have an extension of time in which to make final proof on his entry. The works have been constructed, but they are not in operation. The promoters of this enterprise have been prosecuted by the United States postal authorities and some of them are in the penitentiary now for making fraudulent sales of stock in this irrigation company. The canal and irrigation works can not be operated until the matter is settled in court, and we have therefore added the words "and operation" to the present law. This bill has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and was ordered reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I observe in reading the resolution that it says "further extension." Have they already had an extension?

Mr. HAYDEN. They would be entitled to an extension of the time under the present law, and they have taken advantage of that extension so far as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what is meant by the words "further extension"?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; that is what is meant.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that this provides for an extension of three years.

Mr. HAYDEN. Not to exceed three years.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. You say that this company has completed the works, but they have not been able to put them in operation to supply the water?

Mr. HAYDEN. The company is in the hands of a receiver at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it such litigation that this company can not furnish the water at the present time under the direction of the receivers?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. That is what I understand. Mr. LA FOLLETTE can answer more fully.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is in the hands of a receiver, and they are trying to settle the rights of property. These people have been guilty of a great many frauds, and it is going to be a long-drawn-out fight, as several million dollars are at issue, and there will be a delay on account of court matters. The gentleman is well aware of the fact that sometimes these things drag along quite a while. They ask for the same limit of time as was granted in the law in case of failure of construction. This is just like the law passed by the Sixty-second Congress, with the word "operation" added, as stated by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the proof that they are now required to make under the law?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They have to have a certain amount of water for a certain time on so many acres.

Mr. HAYDEN. The entryman must cultivate one-eighth of the irrigable area of his land.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would be glad if any gentleman can tell me—because I do not know myself—just what the requirements as to proof are; and I want to follow that with a question as to whether an extension of time really affects in a material sense the character of the proof to be made.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can explain the situation. Under the original desert-land act they are given four years in which to irrigate and cultivate their land. They must expend at least a dollar per acre upon the land, and they must irrigate each legal subdivision thereof within the four years.

Now, an act was passed several years ago—a number of acts, in fact—by which the settlers were allowed an extension of time wherein the construction works that were being constructed for the purpose of irrigating this land could be completed. These people have already had that three years' extension of time to get the water upon the land. Now, in this particular case they have completed the construction of the ditches and the dams, and the water is ready to turn upon the land; but the settlers can not prove up until they actually get the water on the land, although they have paid for their water and the ditches are ready to turn the water in, and therefore they are asking an extension of time by which they can have the questions at issue adjusted between themselves and those who built the dam. Private parties built the dam. They have had some trouble over it.

The settlers simply file on the land and pay so much for the water right. The dam and ditches are now constructed, and the settlers simply ask that an extension of three years be given by which they can adjust their interests with the construction parties, and then within the three years they will be able to turn the water upon the lands and irrigate every legal subdivision thereof. In that event they can make their final proof.

Mr. SHERLEY. How are the entries made in the first instance?

Mr. RAKER. By filing in the land office and making a partial purchase payment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there any conflict on entries?

Mr. RAKER. There is no conflict.

Mr. SHERLEY. As I understand the gentleman, the facts are that because of the failure to construct and operate the work required in connection with proof has been delayed?

Mr. RAKER. That is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the same work would have to be done as would have been done in the first instance, the effect of this being simply to extend the time?

Mr. RAKER. In substance; yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that is not exactly the case, what is the fact?

Mr. RAKER. In this particular case there is a law on the statute book by which the Commissioner of the General Land Office, after the first four years have elapsed, can extend the time to get water on the land by reason of works not being completed.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is all a question of time.

Mr. RAKER. Only a question of time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, what I wish to get at is a question of work. A man has to do certain things in order to perfect his title?

Mr. RAKER. Every year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the effect of this bill to change what he shall do, except in the matter of time?

Mr. RAKER. It makes absolutely no change. He has to comply with the law by filing his yearly proof each year and expending as much as a dollar an acre on the land. That is all done. The only thing they want now is an extension of three years, so that they may go to this water ditch and dam already constructed and turn the water on the land. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no question about it, I ask to have the report on this bill printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The Senate report?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Have the House committee made any report?

Mr. RAKER. The House committee have prepared a report; but, in accordance with the policy adopted by the Democratic caucus, that report has not been filed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senate report on this bill will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The Senate report is as follows:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report to accompany S. 1673: The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1673) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension slons of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries in the county of Grant, State of Washington, have given the same very careful consideration and beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

The reasons for the enactment of the measure are set forth in the following correspondence:

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, NORTH YAKIMA, WASH., April 19, 1913.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Mr. Snively and I have been engaged for a year past in an endeavor to regain for the original owners and entrymen possession of a large body of land in the southern part of Grant County, to which they lost title and possession about a year ago through the failure of the De Larm companies (so called), in Seattle.

This De Larm and his associates, as you doubtless are aware, proposed primarily to install a large irrigation enterprise in and around that section on the Columbia River in Grant County known as Wahluke, and which is almost directly across the Columbia River from White Bluffs, and spent about $250,000 on the plant, and induced the homesteaders and desert-land entrymen and landowners in that section to mortgage their claims and lands to his corporation in exchange for proposed permanent water rights for water to be furnished them for part of their land, while at the same time they (De Larm and associates) fraudulently sold and exchanged bonds secured on this enterprise and these lands to thousands of innocent purchasers all over the country, to the extent, it is said, of over $4,000,000, with a resultant total failure of the whole enterprise and prosecution, conviction, and imprisonment of the promoters by the United States Government at Portland, Oreg., for improper use of the mails.

Now, this irrigation plant has been practically completed for a year past, but has not been operated, as the company has been forced into involuntary bankruptcy, and the trustee in bankruptcy has not been able to operate the plant, and consequently the desert-land entrymen under the project who had relied upon it to furnish water to prove up on their claims are in the position that if they can not get a further extension of time from the Government within which to prove up they must either lose their claims or scrip them; and few of these people are able to pay for scrip.

Most of the settlers on these lands have already used the three years' extension from the date of expiration of their original four-year term, to which they are entitled under the present law, and their time for proving up under the present laws will expire during the autumn of the present year.

Now, we desire to know if it will be possible during the present extra session of Congress to have an amendment made to the act which you originally introduced and which was approved February 28, 1911 (36 Stat., 960), entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Benton, Yakima, and Klickitat, in the State of Washington," by having the county of Grant included in the law.

As you are doubtless aware, there are several new projects for reclaiming large bodies of land by irrigation, including the Quincy project, now being promoted in Grant and Douglas Counties, and such an amendment to the existing law would be an inestimable boon to desert-land entrymen throughout that large and important section of our State, and would be highly appreciated by the whole inland empire.

Will you kindly give this matter your earliest convenient attention and advise me at Ellensburg, Wash., as to what we may hope for in the premises?

Believe me, with kindest personal regards,
Very sincerely, yours,

I. C. LLOYD.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 19, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

SIR: I am in receipt of your request for report upon S. 1673, which proposes to give the Secretary of the Interior discretion to grant extensions of time within which to make final proof to any entryman under the desert-land laws in Grant County, Wash., where it is satisfactorily shown that because of unavoidable delay in the construction and operation of irrigation works intended to convey water to the lands embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of reclamation and cultivation of said lands, as required by law, within the time prescribed therefor. The bill further provides that such extensions should not be granted for more than three years, and that the act shall not affect contests initiated for a valid existing reason.

There are in force three general laws under which the time within which desert entrymen are required to make final proof may be extended by administrative action: Section 5, act of June 27, 1906 (34 Stat., 520), authorizing extensions where desert entry is embraced within the exterior limits of a withdrawal or project under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902; section 3, act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat., 52), authorizing an extension of time not exceeding three years, where, because of unavoidable delay in construction of irrigating works, claimant is unable to make proof of reclamation; act of April 30, 1912 (37 Stat., 106), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant a further extension of time, not exceeding three years, upon satisfactory showing of the same conditions as are required by the act of March 28, 1908, supra.

There have been enacted several statutes of special or local application authorizing extensions of time for submission of proof in desert-land cases, such as the act of February 28, 1911, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions, not to exceed three years, to desert-land entrymen in Benton, Yakima, and Klickitat Counties, Wash., because of unavoidable delay in construction of irrigation works; and act of January 26, 1912 (37 Stat., 56), authorizing the granting of a similar extension to desert-land entrymen in the counties of Weld and Larimer, Colo.

Senate bill 1673 differs from existing laws hereinbefore described in that it authorizes relief in cases where the entrymen are prevented from making final proof because of unavoidable delay in the "operation" of irrigation works intended to convey water to the lands, as well as in those cases where there is delay in construction of same. I am not advised as to conditions existing in this connection in Grant County, Wash., but know of no objection to the enactment of the measure. In this connection I suggest the advisability of the enactment of legislation of general application authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant limited extensions of time to desert-land entrymen who, without fault, fraud, or negligence on their part, are unable for good and sufficient reason to comply with the requirements of the law with reference to reclamation and cultivation of lands embraced in their entries, and to make proof and payment thereon within the time specified by the existing general desert-land laws.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913; and

H. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, November 7 to 12, 1913.

SUFFERERS FROM RECENT STORMS IN ALASKA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 136, for the relief of sufferers from recent storms in the Territory of Alaska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended at the direction of the President of the United States in giving aid and relief to the native and white people of the Territory of Alaska who have suffered from the storms occurring along the coast in the vicinity of Nome during the fore part of October.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Washington that I am not prepared at this time to permit the consideration of this resolution appropriating this amount of money. I have had occasion to look a little bit into the situation at Nome as the result of the recent disaster there. I think all that ought to be asked of Congress at this time is to make available an unexpended balance of $4,000 of a fund that was put at the disposition of the Revenue-Cutter Service. That would certainly carry us along in relief work to such time as would enable us to get some definite information from Alaska as to the exact extent of the damage there and how far Congress would be warranted in appropriating an additional sum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has looked into the matter. Is the gentleman informed—and is it a fact—that if relief is to be granted at all it must be granted almost immediately, in order to get it to Alaska before the winter sets in?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not think that the extent of the relief is to be determined by time, so to speak. The department was informed that it is probable that some of the relief, and, in fact, most of it, may be a continuing relief through the winter, in the way of giving some aid and employment to people there.

Mr. MANN. I was informed, and I asked the gentleman for information on that point, that unless Congress acts upon the matter in time so that boats which are about to sail very shortly may carry the relief it will be too late in the winter, because of lack of transportation. I do not know what the fact is.

Mr. SHERLEY. My understanding is that the money desired now is not for the purpose of bringing people out of Nome.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not so much that as to provide during the winter for those there who have been rendered destitute.

Mr. MANN. What I want to get at is, will it be possible a little later, owing to the coming of winter, to send any supplies to Nome?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not so much even to send supplies. There is certain work at which these men can be employed there that will afford them relief in the way of payment for their labor, and also relief to others by virtue of the work done. It is believed that will meet the situation. I had an informal conversation with the Secretary of the Interior about it yesterday. His original information from the marshal of the district was that the situation seemed to be exaggerated, and on the strength of that the matter was held in abeyance. Subsequently telegrams came that seemed to indicate that the view of the marshal was not fully shared, if shared at all, by the other residents there. But the Secretary said to me late yesterday, in a conversation touching the matter, that he believed if this fund was made available it would be sufficient for the immediate present, and meanwhile he would take active steps to get information as to what additional relief, if any, should be granted.

Mr. MANN. That is the opinion of the Secretary—

Mr. SHERLEY. Of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. He asks to make available the balance of the fund that we appropriated on account of the volcanic eruption up there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; there is about $4,000 available; and I shall not object to the consideration of a joint resolution for that purpose.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What kind of employment can these people be given when the thermometer is 60° below zero?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is certain labor in bringing in fuel, and so forth.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Fuel from where?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Washington can answer the gentleman from Michigan more in detail.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is this situation: The tidal storm on the far Alaskan coast about the first of this month was so severe that the cemeteries at Nome and the mining cities were all washed open. Many bodies are unburied and scattered along the ground. Secretary Lane has wired that he has no funds to bury them. The schools have had to close. The waterworks are gone, the lighting plant is gone, and the fuel of the people that had been laid in for the winter is gone. It is absolutely certain that the Government must take care of this Territory and help sustain the community. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky for the introduction of the other resolution transferring this money which was appropriated for the volcanic relief some time ago and allow the question of further relief for the peninsula to come later.

Terrific storms raged during the first three or four days of this month; fully one-third of the residences and business houses were destroyed, and conflagration, which followed, did further damage. The United States cable was out of service for several days, but was repaired, and from the 7th to the 9th telegrams began to come in telling of great distress and immediate need.

The revenue cutter Bear was due at Nome about the 12th, and the heads of the departments here thought it best to await a detailed report from Capt. Ballinger, of the Bear.

On the 15th the revenue cutter Bear reached Nome and her captain sent the following telegram:

NOME, October 15.

TO REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.:

Bear arrived at 6. Information received from mayor, city council, relief committee, and other prominent citizens of Nome indicate loss of about one-third taxable property. Great many homes destroyed. Entire water front devastated. Several craft wrecked. Total loss of life about 12. Estimate places homeless about 500. Abundance of provisions on hand and coming by steamers, but city is in poor financial condition, owing to damage to taxable property, and if relief is not afforded great suffering will occur this winter. Schools will have to be closed for lack of funds, and work of rehabilitation will not be possible. Strongly recommend immediate Federal aid. Minimum sum, $25,000, though $50,000 would be better. Some destitute persons need transportation. Number not known at present; possibly not to exceed 75. Bear leaves 16th to return destitute Eskimos to their homes at Kings Island, Diomedes, and Whales.

BALLINGER, Captain of Bear.

Of course no one was starving at Nome, but the city authorities see clearly that they can not care for the destitute during the long dark winter. It is now too late to send the revenue cutters. The Bear is bringing out 100. Seattle rushed an extra boat north with more supplies and will bring out more destitutes.

But the municipality of Nome is bankrupt; has lost its water system, its electric-light plant; its people have lost their winter's fuel supply and much of their food; the schools must close, and the situation looks black, indeed, even to Alaskans, the most courageous people on the face of the earth.

Representative HUMPHREY of Washington and Delegate WICKERSHAM, of Alaska, are in Seattle, and have forwarded the most reliable information possible. The Treasury Department, the Attorney General's Office, and the Interior Department have all received reports from their Federal agents, and all insist that relief is absolutely necessary. All ask for $50,000, as do the Seattle and Nome Chambers of Commerce. The captain of the Bear, who has had much experience in the far north, says that $50,000 is needed, but that $25,000 is the absolute minimum. Capt. Bertholf, the commandant of the Revenue-Cutter Service, who has had much experience in the Alaskan waters, and whose brave efforts in giving relief to whalers in that frozen region has been recognized by a congressional medal, stated this morning that the sum is needed, and that it is clearly apparent that the money will have to be spent for relief during the winter, and that it will be much better to directly appropriate the money to be spent as the President may direct rather than have deficiencies come in from the various departments which must do the work.

I have asked for only $20,000, and while the $4,000 offered in the second resolution is like a penny on a church platter, I am glad to accept it, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky that if further relief is necessary the various departments which have to do with Alaskan matters will authorize additional expenditures.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Washington that he offer joint resolution 139 for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let the gentleman make that request now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 139.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution he offered, and asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House joint resolution 139, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 139) to relieve destitution among the native people of Alaska.

Resolved, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to expend for the relief of destitute natives of Alaska suffering from the action of a storm in the northern Bering Sea on October 6 to 7, 1913, the unexpended balance remaining of the $30,000 appropriated in the act entitled "An act making appropriation to supply deficiencies and appropriations for the fiscal year 1912, and for other purposes," approved August 26, 1912, to reimburse the Revenue-Cutter Service for expenses incurred in relieving suffering through the action of a volcano near Kodiak, Alaska; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transfer such unexpended balance to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. I think this resolution would only authorize the furnishing of aid to the Eskimos or the natives of Alaska. Is it desirable, from the gentleman's information, to give to the Secretary of the Interior authority to furnish any aid to the Americans who are located at Nome?

Mr. SHERLEY. I see no objection to enlarging the resolution so as to include natives and residents of Alaska and leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. There might arise an individual case, or several cases, where he should have that power. I suggest to the gentleman from Washington that he offer an amendment. Or, Mr. Speaker, I will myself offer the following amendment, that after the word "natives," in line 5, there be inserted the words "and residents."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by inserting after the word "natives" the words "and residents."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD some telegrams in explanation of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to insert some telegrams in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegrams are as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., October 15, 1913.

COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION, Washington, D. C.:

Eight-thousand-dollar relief fund wired from Seattle not shared with natives. Must have immediate funds. Relief needed Chignik, Golovin. Evans wires part winter supplies lost most Norton Sound villages.

LOOP.

NOME, ALASKA, October 7, 1913.
(Via Seattle, Wash., October 8.)

ATTORNEY GENERAL, Washington, D. C.:

Many unidentified dead bodies washed up by storm. Many cases expensive inquest necessary. City wrecked and bankrupt. Can not handle. No provision payment burial without inquest. Wire clerk or marshal pay expenses burial with inquest. Will keep expenses as low as possible.

SCHOFIELD, Commissioner.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON:

After the San Francisco fire Nome sent $12,500 cash, the first money received in San Francisco, and her total contribution was thirteen hundred times more per capita than any other contributing city.

Now in her great calamity she needs aid, and it should be prompt. Congress should make an emergency appropriation of $25,000 to put the city on her feet. The Nation owes this and more to Alaska. Coast cities will also contribute to aid the destitute. We wired $5,000 yesterday and will send more to-day.

SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

SEATTLE, WASH., October 16, 1913.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Cole, manager Miners and Merchants' Bank, Nome, Alaska, wires "400 families lost homes and winter's supply of fuel and provisions, being cared for by city. People of Safety, Solomon, and Golovin to care for. City without funds to rebuild streets and bridges. Congressional assistance advisable. United States marshal denies sending reports as stated."

JAMES WICKERSHAM.

SEATTLE, WASH., October 13, 1913.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON:

Need for Government aid to Nome imperative. Two miles of water front devastated. All buildings completely destroyed. Eight hundred whites and three hundred natives homeless. Loss of property estimated at $1,000,000. A community of 2,500 people can not support this large number of destitute through approaching winter. Navigation closes Bering Sea November 1. Last passenger and freight steamer will leave Seattle for Nome October 20. Passenger accommodation on returning steamers from Nome already engaged. People at Nome taking care of immediate demands, but can not continue long. Hope Government will immediately appropriate sufficient funds for purpose. Suggest $25,000.

W. E. HUMPHREY.

JUNEAU, ALASKA, October 10.
(Via Seattle, Wash., October 13.)

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON:

Strongly indorse appropriation $20,000 by Congress for relief Nome sufferers. Half of town washed away and many people ruined and in need.

STRONG, Governor.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the currency. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram from my colleague, Mr. EDWARDS, announcing the death of his brother. I ask unanimous consent that he may have 10 days' leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for 10 days' leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. EDWARDS, on account of death in the family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on some discriminations and inequalities in the postal service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the postal service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 37, answered "present" 11, not voting 307, as follows:

 Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 22, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of Amite River, from the mouth of Bayou Manchac to a point west of the town of Liberty, in Amite County, Miss. (H. Doc. No. 257), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8974) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Covington, Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 8975) to increase the limit of cost for the addition to the Federal building at Nashville, Tenn., and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire additional land by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, if in his discretion it is necessary to do so for the enlargement of said building; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 8976) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Guilford, in the State of Connecticut; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8977) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Milford, in the State of Connecticut; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 8978) to make October 12 in each year a public holiday, to be called Columbus Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KEATING: Resolution (H. Res. 290) authorizing the appointment of a committee to make an investigation of conditions in the coal fields in Las Animas, Huerfano, Fremont, Grand, Routt, Boulder, Weld, and other counties in the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. KINKAID of New Jersey: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 143) to provide for the establishment of a plant for the manufacture of armor plate for the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AVIS: A bill (H. R. 8979) for the relief of the heirs of Nancy Montgomery; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DONOHUE: A bill (H. R. 8980) granting a pension to Thomas McGuinness; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8981) for the relief of N. B. Woods; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FOSTER: A bill (H. R. 8982) granting a pension to Thomas Stiffler; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8983) granting a pension to J. T. Braddy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8984) granting an increase of pension to Daniel B. Mills; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8985) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Henry Benjamin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8986) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver two mounted bronze cannon on carriages to post, Grand Army of the Republic, Vandalia, Ill.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8987) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver one mounted bronze cannon on carriage to post, Grand Army of the Republic, Hunt, Ill.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 8988) granting a pension to Letta D. Webster; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8989) granting an increase of pension to Alpheus Danley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 8990) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide H. Baker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8991) granting an honorable discharge to Patrick Bolan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8992) granting an honorable discharge to James McKenzie; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 8993) granting relief to R. R. Baker, P. H. Trendt, Mary H. Manning, Mrs. Fred Schadler, S. S. Garrett, A. C. Lowell, and Harry Watson, of Fort Bidwell, Cal., and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 8994) for the relief of Elisha K. White; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8995) granting an increase of pension to Hezekiah Bradds; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 8996) granting an increase of pension to Robert A. Robinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8997) granting a pension to Catharine L. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 8998) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Ed Pruett; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: Evidence to accompany bill H. R. 8981 for the relief of N. B. Woods; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Petition of the Central Labor Union of Meriden, Conn., favoring the passage of the Booher-Hensley bill, to regulate merchandise produced by convict labor; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 22, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

OCTOBER 22, 1913.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. H. F. ASHURST, a Senator from the State of Arizona, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ASHURST thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MEMORIAL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the pending seamen's bill until after the meeting of the international conference on safety to life and property at sea has been held, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 3319) granting an increase of pension to Emily H. Harrington (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 3320) granting an increase of pension to Alexander H. Farmer (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

CORBETT TUNNEL CLAIMS.

Mr. MYERS. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read to the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 74) appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the reclamation fund in the Treasury supplemental and additional to the appropriation made in public resolution 56, Sixty-second Congress, the sum of $15,750, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of and to be paid to those persons who have presented claims, remaining unpaid, on account of labor, supplies, materials, or cash furnished to the contractor or the subcontractor and used in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, including the spillway connected therewith, as a part of the Shoshone Irrigation project, in the State of Wyoming, under any contract or contracts let for that purpose by the Government of the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to forthwith, and as soon as may be, investigate, hear evidence about, determine, and declare the several amounts due and remaining unpaid, if any, on account thereof, and to whom so due, and to certify the amounts due to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to pay the several amounts so ascertained to the persons entitled to the same: Provided, That no such claims not now filed shall be considered: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall deduct from the amounts to be certified for payment hereunder and under the said resolution to each claimant a proportionate sum to cover the expense of and fair compensation for the person or persons through whose time and services this matter has been laid before Congress, except such claimants as have agreed with such person or persons for compensation; and such deductions shall be certified for payment to such person or persons in like manner as other claims.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, substantially this same measure was considered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations of the Sixty-second Congress and reported favorably and unanimously passed by this body as an item in the deficiency appropriation bill. So it has once passed this body unanimously and has had substantially the unanimous approval of this body after consideration by a committee. But in the closing hours of the Sixty-second Congress the House rejected all amendments to the bill of which it was a part, and in the hurry it was lost in conference.

Substantially this same measure was again introduced in this the Sixty-third Congress as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. So this measure at this session has been referred once to a committee of this body and considered by the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill. It was not recommended by that committee to be adopted by the Senate because the committee did not consider it technically a deficiency or as having a proper place in an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. There appeared to be no objection to the merits of it. I appeared before the committee and discussed it exhaustively with the committee, and not one objection was made to the merits, but merely to giving it a place in the urgent deficiency bill.

So it has been before a committee of this body at this session as well as unanimously passed by the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress. It is only supplemental to something that has been done by Congress before in order to piece out and supply a deficiency, as I call it, that has already been recognized upon its merit by Congress.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I hardly think that is a proper course, and I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I make this motion in the absence of the chairman of the committee, because I think it ought to go there.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not quite hear the statement of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Florida makes that motion, may I be permitted to say a word to the Senate and to him?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senate very carefully investigated the merit of the proposal long ago. When it originally came before Congress it was believed that the claims which ought to be paid or which were asked to be paid amounted to but $42,000, and Congress appropriated $42,000 to make the payment, recognizing the justice of the general demand. Under the act passed then the Secretary of the Interior gave notice and the claimants came in to prove their demand. It then appeared that instead of being $42,000 the real amount was $57,000.

The claims are now proved before the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary has $42,000 to distribute as a dividend among holders of claims aggregating $57,000. Of course the equities of those claims that were not then known are just as strong as the equities of those that were known. Accordingly, as the Senator from Montana has stated, in the Sixty-second Congress we added to the original appropriation the $15,000 necessary to pay the additional claims in full. Unfortunately our action in that respect was not ratified by the House, not because the House disagreed with regard to the merit of the matter but because in the confusion of the last hours the subject could not be considered.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President—

Mr. CUMMINS. I am coming to what I want the Senator from Florida particularly to know. When the matter came up the other day the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who, as I understood it, had charge of the matter on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, objected. There is a very grave reason, and it is a pathetic reason really, for action at this time. There is a woman who has been here for three or four years endeavoring to secure relief. Her home is involved in these demands. Her fidelity to the work in which she has been engaged, I think, has challenged the admiration of everyone who has come in contact with her.

The Secretary of the Interior holds—and very properly—that the claims for labor which had really been paid by the merchants in that vicinity who had supplied the laboring men with the necessities of life in exchange for their time checks for labor must be proven by the affidavits of the laborers themselves. The laborers have been dispersed. They are scattered over three or four States. The time fixed for this proof expires, I think, some time in January. I am not sure about the date. There is no other person, save this woman, who has labored so honorably and so persistently and so successfully here for this matter, to collect this proof. She is the only person who can do it, and unless this appropriation can be made, so as to relieve her from the work in which she has been engaged here, there will be another delay and still further confusion.

I had a discussion of the matter with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who was rather acting, I think, in a way for the Committee on Appropriations. He made an objection, founded, I think, upon a misapprehension. Yesterday I telegraphed to him asking him if he still felt that he ought on behalf of the committee to object to the immediate consideration of this joint resolution, and I have from him this telegram, and that is the real thing that I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator from Florida:

SAULSBURY, N. C., October 21, 1913.

I withdraw all opposition to passage of bill in McDonald matter, so far as I am concerned.

If the Senator from Florida, in consideration of what I have said, and in consideration of the present attitude of the Senator from North Carolina in the matter, can waive the suggestion of referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, I am sure that justice will be done and a very meritorious proposal can be at once effected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I desire to assure the Senator from Iowa that I did not make the motion with any intention that the joint resolution should be delayed. The matter was brought before the Committee on Appropriations a few weeks ago. I happened to be on the subcommittee. I think it ought to go back to the committee, and I have no doubt it will be promptly reported.

The Senator will notice that in the joint resolution there is a provision that no other claims, except those which have already been presented at this time, shall be paid.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. MYERS. It has been seven years since the last of this work was done, and I think there ought to be a statute of limitations to everything except murder. This surely is not to be classed as murder, and there should be a statute of limitations.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator is not asking me a question.

Mr. MYERS. Does not the Senator think there ought to be some limit?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. MYERS. Are not seven years long enough, I would ask the Senator?

Mr. BRYAN. I think a joint resolution providing for an appropriation ought at least to be considered by the committee which usually deals with such a subject. No harm can be done by allowing the joint resolution to go to the committee, so that it may be considered there. I voted for the bill—

Mr. BORAH and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield, and to whom?

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRYAN. In a moment. I voted for the bill before. I remember to have voted to pass it over the President's veto. There is in the bill, one might as well admit, a very dangerous precedent. It is that the Government shall undertake to make good the loss of money by merchants when trusting men who are working for the Government on public works. However, because of the fact that the amount of money appropriated by the former act and by this joint resolution will be charged up against the land and will be repaid by those who hereafter purchase it—

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. It is thought—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator wait a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. BRYAN. It was thought proper to make that requirement as to this project.

Again assuring the Senator from Iowa that there is no purpose in my mind to delay the matter, I think the orderly and usual course should be followed by referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, as it deals with an appropriation. As I said, I made the motion in the absence of the chairman of the committee, because I was a member of the subcommittee that considered it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to inform the Senator from Florida that he is under a misapprehension in one respect. This money is not chargeable to the particular land involved. That was undertaken to be made the method when the proposition was first launched in the Senate and there was objection to it. Then it was changed and the original appropriation of $42,000 was made, so that it simply comes out of the general reclamation fund, and it is taxed upon no land in particular. This supplemental joint resolution is drawn in the same way. So the money does not come out of the particular land.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Montana is asking a most unusual thing. The Senator knows how the committee feel about it. I submit to him that the joint resolution ought to go to the committee for its consideration.

I yield now to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume the motion of the Senator from Florida will likely prevail, assuming that the Senate takes the course on that kind of a motion it ordinarily follows; but does the Senator from Florida think there would be a report on the joint resolution in a reasonable time?

Mr. BRYAN. I have no doubt a report will be made during the week.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, while I am very much interested in the passage of this joint resolution, knowing a great deal about the circumstances and conditions which surround the particular transaction, I think if the joint resolution could be reported out in a very few days that we should be satisfied with that statement of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize that that would be the usual course; I recognize, too, that it requires but an objection to prevent the consideration of the joint resolution; and while I am not in charge of it, I have such implicit faith in the justice of the claim and in the willingness of the Senator from Florida to forward its course through the Committee on Appropriations that I suggest to the Senator from Montana not to resist the motion made by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to make the statement that the Committee on Appropriations is not the proper committee to handle this joint resolution anyway, if it is to go to a committee. The original legislation which appropriated $42,000 never went to the Committee on Appropriations, but it went to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. If this joint resolution is to go to a committee, it ought to go to the same committee; and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who is sitting here, would be the one to object to the joint resolution being adopted without going to a committee. His committee is the one that has always had jurisdiction and charge of this matter and is the committee which originally considered it. I repeat, the original appropriation of $42,000 was favorably reported by that committee and then passed by the Senate. If this supplemental joint resolution is to go to any committee, it should consistently go to the same committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Montana to state that this joint resolution had already been considered by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. MYERS. The joint resolution has been referred to that committee in the form of an amendment and has been considered by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, why should the Senator from Montana object now to the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations? It is for the appropriation of certain money; and that committee has already considered it, as the Senator states. I think the joint resolution should very properly go to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would suggest to the Senator from Montana—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator from Montana ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MYERS. I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, if I understand the matter, the question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MYERS. I have not heard any such objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. A motion was attempted to be made to refer the joint resolution to a committee, and I assume that a single objection would prevent further consideration of it at the present time. I should think that would be the first thing to be determined.

Mr. MYERS. Sometimes Senators are prevailed upon not to make objections. I simply want to reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] by saying that when this joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations it was considered in the shape of an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill. That is the reason it went to that committee, but the original proposition went to and was considered by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana is perfectly right in that. I remember very well the history of the original measure, and I would not have objected, and do not now object, if the Senate sees proper to refer the joint resolution to the Irrigation Committee, but it seems to me that the committee—

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, I do not see—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MYERS. I will continue to yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] until he concludes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that my only object in speaking was to state that the joint resolution already having been referred and having been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, as stated by the Senator himself, I thought quicker action could be secured by that committee than by referring the joint resolution to any other committee.

Mr. MYERS. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to what committee the joint resolution be referred, if it has to be referred.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would suggest to the Senator that if reference is to be made of the joint resolution, it would be safer and speedier now to have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations, because the Senator will appreciate that at this particular time it is impossible to get a quorum of Senators in attendance on the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and there would consequently be delay.

I desire to suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that the facts in this case have heretofore been fully presented to and passed upon by the Senate. I am heartily in favor of the passage of this joint resolution or of similar legislation which might be reported by the committee, but I should like at this time to see the joint resolution pass without objection.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I simply wish to ask the Senator from Florida if he will not be as magnanimous as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has been in his telegram. Both Senators have been consulted freely about this matter, and there is no doubt that one has had as much to do with it as the other in the way of objecting to it. We may not have a quorum after to-morrow for quite a while, and I doubt if we shall have another opportunity to do anything at this session in regard to passing this joint resolution. A little later currency legislation will wholly engross the attention of this body.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MYERS. I do, to answer a question.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, it has been my experience with the Senator from Montana that when he asks for unanimous consent he generally gets it, and I shall not now make an exception. However, I think it is a bad practice to bring in a bill or a joint resolution making appropriations the same as would be made in a bill and have it passed by the Senate without any reference ever having been made to a committee. If, however, the Senate wants to consent to that, so far as I am concerned, I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been in entire sympathy with the position which the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has taken, and it seems to me he ought not to withdraw his objection, but that the joint resolution ought to go to a committee.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator from Nebraska a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. MYERS. I would say to the Senator from Nebraska that this matter has already been before the Committee on Appropriations at this session.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it has been before both Houses of Congress, and has provoked a great deal of debate.

Mr. MYERS. It has been before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. And there was a great deal of opposition to it.

Mr. MYERS. It was before the committee at this session only a few days ago.

Mr. NORRIS. It was once vetoed by the President of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Not this joint resolution, but another one.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, some legislation having the same object in view.

Mr. BORAH. That legislation was not vetoed by the President, but it was vetoed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NORRIS. Be that as it may, it does not seem to be the proper thing to appropriate, particularly out of the reclamation fund, this amount of money to pay claims that as I understand—I may be misinformed—have no legal basis. It is admitted, I presume, that they are not legal, though there may be a great many equities in them; but I know that perhaps two or three years ago the matter provoked a great deal of debate. I am not saying that I am opposed to the joint resolution; I do not know that I will oppose it, but I do not think the Senator from Montana ought to ask the Senate to pass by unanimous consent a joint resolution so important as this, as to which there are at least two sides and a great deal of opposition.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. If we had a quorum here right along, if the committees were meeting, and we were doing business as usual, I would not think of asking for immediate action on the joint resolution, but the situation is becoming desperate so far as securing the consideration of any matter before this body or before any committee of this body at this time is concerned. The subject has been considered so long and so thoroughly that the peculiar exigencies of the situation impel me to make this request. I hope now, the objection having been withdrawn on this side of the Chamber, that the Senator from Nebraska may find it in his heart to withdraw his objection from that side.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Montana that if this joint resolution should pass, there is not a quorum of the House of Representatives in the city, and I do not see how the matter would be expedited. There is not a quorum of the other House present, and it has been announced on the floor of that body by the leader of the majority side that Members of that body will not be expected to be here, and nobody expects the House to have a quorum during the remainder of the special session.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that they are to have a quorum to-morrow; but, aside from that, I must say, with all due respect to the Senator, that the plea that it is of no use trying to get anything through the Senate at this time because the House will not give it attention has long ago made me heart-sick. I feel that we owe a duty to the country; I want to discharge my duty, and I want to see this body discharge its duty. If it does do so, and the House will not discharge its duty or attend to business, then we are not responsible. I understand, however, as I have said, that there is almost a certainty that they will have a quorum in the House to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, as to that—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. I desire first to reply to what the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has said. As an abstract proposition I agree with him that what the other House is going to do perhaps ought not to influence us in the transaction of the business which comes before the Senate; but the Senator offers this resolution now and asks that it be taken out of its regular course, because he is in a hurry and wants to get it through. To meet his contention I made the suggestion that it will not expedite it a particle if we pass it here by unanimous consent. It could just as well go to the committee and be reported back, and let the committee investigate it, if they think it necessary to investigate it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The resolution could pass the House unless the question of no quorum were raised.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, does the Senator think that it is good practice to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States when there is not a quorum of either body present?

Mr. CUMMINS. Three-fourths of the appropriation bills are passed without the presence of a quorum. That has been my observation. This matter stands on a very different footing from an ordinary appropriation bill which involves a new subject. This question has been before Congress and its merits have been fully discussed. I do not want to go into them now. It would take too long.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator owes it to those of us who do not understand the matter to go into its merits.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is sufficient to say that the contract that was entered into for the building of the tunnel was entered into shortly after the law was changed, which took away from material men and laboring men the remedy which they theretofore had upon the bond given to the United States for the fulfillment of the contract. The people who furnished the material and did the labor had not been informed of the change in the law, and they, therefore, furnished the subcontractors with the necessities for building this tunnel, believing that they had a remedy that would give them their money in the event the subcontractor was unable to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion before we go into the debate upon this matter?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska has referred to the fact that a bill or joint resolution similar to this passed the Senate and was vetoed by the President. I desire to say that the bill was also passed over the President's veto. Certainly, Mr. President, the bill was given a vast amount of consideration if we were prepared to pass it over the veto of the President; and to delay the matter any longer, after the thorough consideration which has certainly been given to it by both Houses of Congress, not only when the bill was originally discussed, but after the veto of the President, is simply to deny these people justice.

Mr. CUMMINS. Moreover—

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, if the matter had not been properly considered and an appropriation were now sought as an original proposition, I certainly should not advocate for a moment adopting any unusual course; but we have given it all the consideration that it needs and all the consideration that we will ever give it. If it goes to the Committee on Appropriations or to any other committee it will receive no more consideration than it has already had.

Mr. CUMMINS. To complete what I was beginning to say—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. These considerations and the further fact that the United States had received the benefit of every dollar which had been advanced to the subcontractor—

Mr. NORRIS. Now, is it not true that this will be a second payment on behalf of the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like to vote to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States until I know what the facts are.

Mr. CUMMINS. The facts have all been developed. There was a hearing, at which every circumstance was related. It was believed then, as I said a few moments ago, that the claims against the subcontractor amounted to $42,000. That was the best information the Congress could get at that time. We passed the act recognizing the justice of the claims. The Secretary of the Interior then gave notice for the proving of the claims in accordance with the terms of the act; and it then appeared that instead of the claims amounting to $42,000 they amounted to $57,000. The time has expired for the proving of those claims. We know now how many claims there are against the project, and we recognized them when we passed the original bill.

This joint resolution is simply to add $15,000 to the amount heretofore appropriated, to be expended for the very same purpose and for the same reason, because the $42,000 which we have already appropriated will be distributed pro rata among the $57,000 of claim holders.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I think we are getting some facts here that are material. I want to ask the Senator a question. I understand that there has already been an appropriation made of $42,000. Is that true?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. To cover the identical claims that this is to cover. Is that true?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the appropriation of $42,000 was made, believing that all the claims that came within the class that we—

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. That we recognized would amount to $42,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That amount would not pay the claims in full?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was intended to pay them all in full.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but later developments disclosed the fact that there had not been money enough appropriated to cover all of them?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. The $42,000 heretofore appropriated, without this joint resolution, would be distributed pro rata among all the claimants. Is not that true?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, I believe.

Mr. NORRIS. This is to make up the deficiency?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there anything else in it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Nothing else that I know of.

Mr. NORRIS. If those are the facts, I will not make any objection to the joint resolution. I want to ask the Senator who offered it if that is a fair statement of the facts in the case?

Mr. MYERS. Absolutely. The facts are very few and simple, and the Senator from Iowa has correctly stated them, as brought out at the hearings heretofore had.

Mr. NORRIS. While I do not feel called upon to urge an objection, being a new Senator here, it does seem to me that this method of legislation is not wise, particularly where it is proposed to appropriate money out of a special fund, which I think ought to be guarded with jealous care. It may develop later on that somebody else has a claim, and we may find out that the $57,000—

Mr. MYERS. It is limited.

Mr. NORRIS. Has that been covered?

Mr. MYERS. This joint resolution limits it, and provides that no more claims shall be considered.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that; but I presume the $42,000 limited it also; did it not?

Mr. MYERS. No; it did not. That is a mistake. It did not limit it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that this happened six or seven years ago, and after the passage of the original measure, which was passed by the Sixty-second Congress, the Secretary of the Interior gave notice as widely and as publicly as he could, asking all claimants to come forward and prove their demands. In answer to that notice these claims have been filed. While theoretically it is not impossible that there may be another claim somewhere, it is practically certain that there are no other claims than these.

Mr. NORRIS. Have the claims been paid once? Has the contractor himself been paid by the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. When the contractor failed the Government took over the work and completed it. The contractor has not been paid. The contract was taken at a price that rendered it utterly impossible to complete the work for the contract price.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Government completed the contract?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government completed the contract, and has taken the penalty of the bond, or a portion of it, I do not remember what portion, for reimbursement. The reimbursement from the surety on the bond does not entirely make the Government whole, but it helps along that line.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, if he will allow me, that I understood him to say he would make no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution. If consent is given for its present consideration, all this information can be elicited in a very short time.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Senator knows that is not the usual course.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In other words, I think it is simply a question of order. If consent is not going to be given, of course there is no use in wasting an hour in debating the matter on its merits. If we can have consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, we can take half an hour, if necessary, in considering it on its merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, we have an important matter pending before the Senate. I gave way for this joint resolution, understanding that it would take only about 10 minutes to discuss it. I should like to know how long there is likely to be discussion of the subject?

Mr. MYERS. I think there will be practically none at all. The facts are practically all understood by Senators.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply have one or two questions to ask of the Senator. I do not rise to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I do wish to ask one or two questions before it is voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, then, Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice in the joint resolution a proviso, and I wish to ask the Senator from Montana a question as to his understanding of the effect of that proviso.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, for my information, may the joint resolution be again read, so that I may see the effect of what the Senator is going to ask?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the joint resolution.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is the last proviso about which I desire to ask the Senator from Montana. The proviso is:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall deduct from the amounts to be certified for payment hereunder and under the said resolution to each claimant a proportionate sum to cover the expense of and fair compensation for the person or persons through whose time and services this matter has been laid before Congress, except such claimants as have agreed with such person or persons for compensation, and such deductions shall be certified for payment to such person or persons in like manner as other claims.

That is rather a remarkable provision in a joint resolution; and I wish to ask the Senator from Montana if he has any knowledge as to what persons are interested in receiving compensation out of this appropriation?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, Mr. President; only one, and that is Mrs. Katherine McDonald, of Butte, Mont. She has spent three or four years of time here at the Capitol, at her own expense, in pressing this matter and putting it through. If it had not been for her efforts, labor, and time spent, and the money she has expended, none of these claimants would have been reimbursed.

It is just on the same principle that when a matter is laid before the Court of Claims by a resolution of Congress it has often been the practice, as I understand, to authorize the Court of Claims to fix what may be a reasonable attorney's fee and say what the fee shall be. This proviso leaves it to the Department of the Interior to investigate and hear evidence about the labor, the time, and the expenditure involved, and leaves it to the Secretary of the Interior to say what would be a reasonable and fair percentage to reimburse this lady for her efforts and money expended, except, of course, where some few claimants, as I understand, have agreed with Mrs. McDonald to pay her upon stated terms, in which case they are governed by their own agreement as to what they shall pay her, if the appropriation shall be made. In other cases the joint resolution leaves it to the court, you might say, to decide what is a reasonable compensation. That is the object of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a minute. I wanted to say to the Senator that, as I understand this matter, the original claim of $42,000 was nearly all due to Mrs. McDonald.

Mr. MYERS. No; not all of it; the Senator is mistaken about that—not nearly all of it; I feel safe in saying, not over half of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, this proviso applies only to the $15,000 provided in this resolution. It does not apply to the original amount of $42,000, does it?

Mr. MYERS. That would depend upon its wording. I was under the impression that it would apply to the whole appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I was undecided as to whether it did or not. That is the reason I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. MYERS. If not, she would be that much worse off. I think it ought to apply to the whole amount. If not, she would have to stand the loss.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly think it ought to apply to the whole if to any. That is one of the reasons I asked the Senator whether, in his opinion, it did or did not.

Mr. MYERS. The amendment was suggested by an official of the Department of the Interior, and his language was simply adopted. It says "hereunder and under the said resolution." "Hereunder" would mean "under this resolution." The words "and under the said resolution" would refer to public resolution 56 of the Sixty-second Congress, mentioned up here at the top of the resolution. I think. It reads:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall deduct from the amounts to be certified for payment hereunder and under the said resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. It says "said resolution to each claimant."

Mr. MYERS. I should like, then, to ask unanimous consent to insert, after the words "said resolution," the words "No. 56," so as to refer to the resolution mentioned up at the top. I ask unanimous consent to amend the resolution in that respect and at that place so as to make it read, "said public resolution No. 56 of the Sixty-second Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification proposed by the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MYERS. That was the intention. I thank the Senator for calling attention to it, because the language is a little obscure; but that is what was meant.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I thought.

I have just one other word to say in connection with the joint resolution. In many of our appropriations, particularly those where pensions are granted, and I believe in nearly all cases of claims coming from the Claims Committee, we prohibit the payment of attorneys' fees in the collection of any part of a pension or of a claim. This joint resolution provides for the payment of a compensation to those who have been interested in securing its passage through Congress.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, does it provide for the payment of a fee to go to an attorney?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not to an attorney; it is a fee to go to Mrs. McDonald, who is personally interested in the matter financially, and has also been interested in gathering together claims and presenting them to Congress, and getting through Congress a joint resolution appropriating money to pay the same.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is that a part of the collections that are to be made?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a part of the collections that are to be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no additional sum to go to her.

Mr. MYERS. Nothing extra.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say to the Senator that Mrs. McDonald is not an attorney. Mrs. McDonald and her husband kept a little store in the vicinity of this work; and they advanced to those who were engaged on the work, out of their store, the necessities of life, until they had invested in the enterprise practically all that they had. Moreover, they mortgaged their home in order to enable them to carry forward their business. When this disaster came, all that Mrs. McDonald wanted was reimbursement for the money or groceries or dry goods or what not that they had advanced; but she could not get pay for the amount due her without making like provision for the other creditors who stood in the same case. She has been here pleading with the Government and with Congress for three or four years now for her pay, and to save her home. The other creditors, who have been under no expense, will secure from this legislation the same benefit that she secures; and it is only equitable and fair that they should contribute to the expense that has been incident to the work of developing and laying before Congress the facts in the case. Not a penny is to be paid to Mrs. McDonald or anybody else under this joint resolution in addition to the claims that exist against the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not infer I said that Mrs. McDonald was an attorney.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not refer to her in any such terms.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not understand the Senator to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with every statement the Senator has made in relation to the hardships she has passed through. The only thought in my mind was that while Mrs. McDonald ought to be paid, under the wording of this proviso she will be paid by certain persons who have already made an agreement with her; and it seems proper that such an agreement should be made with all, and not be provided for in this resolution. I do not care what agreement it was, or how much they agreed to pay her; I think she is entitled to compensation. If compensation is provided for in this resolution, it shall be worded so as to apply to the original appropriation of $42,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand it does.

Mr. SMOOT. It will now, with the amendment that was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire what percentage of the collections she is to get?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to say that I shall not vote for any general appropriation for a claim of which some agent is to get an indefinite percentage. I think one of the curses of claims before the Government is that there are hanging around this town men who make their living by getting the largest percentage they can get out of somebody who may have a claim against the Government. Millions of dollars are taken out of the Public Treasury by constructive claims in this way where some attorney or representative is to get a large part of the appropriation.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, this is not such a case. It is not Mrs. McDonald's business to collect claims against the Government. By very force of circumstances she has been driven into this effort. It can not be said that the principle just mentioned, which is a very just one when applied to a professional claim agent, who makes it a business to solicit claims against the Government for his living, should be applied to her. If the Senator from Kansas knew her as I know her, he would realize that the general prejudice against claim agents does not lie against her.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to say that the reason I made the inquiry was to get information. Some of us who are members of the Committee on Claims have tried to get a law enacted which would limit the extortions of these men in regard to such claims. I do not want to vote for a bill in violation of the principle that I think ought to be laid down in that regard. If it is a reasonable claim, I think it is a very proper thing, from what I have learned, that Mrs. McDonald should have a reasonable percentage of these claims which she has aided in collecting.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only reason I mention this question is that being a member of the Committee on Claims and agreeing through experience with the statement of the Senator from Kansas just announced to the Senate, and knowing that it has been the policy of the Committee on Pensions, of which I am a member, not to include in any resolution or bill a provision for the payment of an attorney's fee, but prohibiting them, I do not want to vote for this resolution, and have it pointed to in future as a precedent, and have some Senator remind me that I voted for this measure, and therefore should not object to attorneys' fees being provided for in future bills. This is one reason why I bring the question to the attention of the Senate, and for the still further reason that if we are going to provide compensation for the expenses and compensation incurred, it should not apply only to the $15,000 appropriation in this resolution but to the former appropriation of $42,000 as well.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—WILLIAM HOBERG.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Arizona (for Mr. CATRON) it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Hoberg, accompanying Senate bill No. 4539, introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

TRIAL OF MENDEL BEILIS.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 198) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the public press reports that the Government of the Empire of Russia is now engaged in the prosecution of a Jewish laborer, Mendel Beilis, upon the charge of having murdered a Christian boy for the purpose of using Christian blood for religious purposes; Whereas there appears absolutely nothing in the Jewish religion or doctrines requiring such a practice, but on the contrary the use of blood in any manner is absolutely prohibited by the Mosaic law, Leviticus xvii, 10;

Whereas eminent divines and scholars of all religions and denominations have testified to the falsity of the accusation that the Jewish religion requires the use or the sacrifice of human blood;

Whereas the constant and relentless persecution of the Jews in Russia is bringing to our shores thousands of Russian Jewish refugees, who must be taken care of, and the United States Government is therefore directly interested in this matter; and

Whereas the Beilis trial is calculated to incite the ignorant people in Russia to commit outrages against Jewish people, and as a result of such fear the Jewish immigration to the United States since the commencement of the Beilis trial has already increased: Therefore be it Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Senate of the United States looks with disfavor upon the prosecution of the Beilis case, and that the proper officers of the Government be directed to use the good offices of the Government of the United States with the Government of Russia to the end that the unjust ritual charge against the Jewish people at large, and Mendel Beilis in particular, be withdrawn, and the Jewish people receive the vindication justice requires.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. BURTON rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 136.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator from Ohio will yield to me for a moment, I will state that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who is absent on business of the Senate, had some telegrams sent to him with reference to the pending bill which he has sent to me, and I ask to have them printed in the Record. They are to the effect that the senders prefer that the bill should not be acted on until after the international conference in London has been held.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 20, 1913.

HON. CHARLES TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Kindly make every effort to defeat La Follette substitute to seamen's bill. It is drastic and impossible to carry out. Present regulations made by department regarding lifeboats on Great Lakes is proper and satisfactory.

A. A. SCHANTZ.

DETROIT, MICH., October 20, 1913.

HON. CHARLES TOWNSEND, Washington, D. C.:

Kindly make every effort to defeat Senator La Follette's substitute bill to the seamen's bill. It is drastic and impossible to carry out. Present lifeboat regulations on Great Lakes passed by the department are proper and satisfactory.

E. A. DUSTIN,
President Ashley & Dustin Steamer Line.

HON. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly request that the vote on the seamen's bill be deferred until after the international conference in London has been held, and respectfully ask your cooperation to this extent.

CHICAGO & SOUTH HAVEN STEAMSHIP CO.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks certain tables, statements, and statutes, with the reading of which I do not wish to detain the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD certain tables, statements, and so forth. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, whatever the popular impression may be, very much progress has been made in the last three years in measures for greater safety at sea. Our own country has taken a prominent part in this movement, and so have the leading maritime nations of the world.

I would call attention, in the first place, to the wireless act of June 24, 1910, passed by Congress. To this and similar legislation may be ascribed the safety of hundreds; yes, of thousands of lives. That act provided:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1911, it shall be unlawful for any ocean-going steamer of the United States, or of any foreign country, carrying passengers and carrying 50 or more persons, including passengers and crew, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio-communication, in good working order, in charge of a person skilled in the use of such apparatus, which apparatus shall be capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, night or day: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to steamers plying only between ports less than 200 miles apart.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act apparatus for radio-communication shall not be deemed to be efficient unless the company installing it shall contract in writing to exchange, and shall, in fact, exchange, as far as may be physically practicable, to be determined by the master of the vessel, messages with shore or ship stations using other systems of radio-communication.

After that follows the penalty clause.

Notwithstanding this very salutary act, a great deal of confusion still existed. There were many systems for the use of wireless—various appliances—and the different nations of the earth interested in maritime affairs framed a convention, which was presented to the Senate by the President, providing for numerous regulations. For a long time that treaty was pending in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I am glad to state that early in the year 1912 the committee authorized me to report it to the Senate, and it was reported, and its ratification advised by the Senate April 3, 1912, a brief time before the loss of the Titanic.

A short time before the Titanic disaster it was evident that the use of wireless could only be made thoroughly effective by international agreement. This agreement provided for the method of transmitting messages from one ship to another, for the keeping of accounts, for the maintenance of a bureau at Berne to conduct correspondence between different countries in matters pertaining to wireless. It also provided certain essentials—first, that all systems of wireless telegraphy should communicate—that, for instance, the Marconi could not refuse to receive a message from the De Forest system or any other system of wireless. There had been instances in which a boat having a wireless installation had absolutely refused to receive a message from another boat having a different patent or system. This convention made communication compulsory, whatever might be the system. It made compulsory also communication between stations on shore and stations on ships.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Perhaps the Senator was going to make the statement, and if so I apologize; but is it true that all the different systems of wireless are capable of communicating with each other?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; at least with very trivial adjustment. As it is now, they are all able to communicate one with another.

The convention also provided for giving precedence to distress signals. It was necessary to follow this convention by further legislation, and an elaborate statute was passed prohibiting interference, regulating what are called the amateur stations, of which there are thousands in the country, providing that the Government may have the preference at the beginning of each hour, and also providing that no private station shall be established within a certain distance of a governmental station. It is provided that, under regulations made by the executive department, governmental stations shall receive private messages, the object of that being to do away with the necessity of private installation near Government stations.

But Congress, on the 23d of July, 1912, passed a still more stringent statute in regard to wireless—public act No. 238. The first section provides:

That from and after October 1, 1912, it shall be unlawful for any steamer of the United States or of any foreign country navigating the ocean or the Great Lakes and licensed to carry, or carrying, 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew, or both, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication, in good working order, capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night.

It adds several features to the prior act of 1910. One of them which is very essential follows:

An auxiliary power supply, independent of the vessel's main electric power plant, must be provided which will enable the sending set for at least four hours to send messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, and efficient communication between the operator in the radio room and the bridge shall be maintained at all times.

That is, if the steam power should give out, unless there was an auxiliary power supplied by battery or otherwise, the wireless might be rendered entirely useless.

There is another essential difference between the former and the latter law in that the statute makes no distinction between the passenger steamer and the cargo steamer. Whether the 50 persons be made up of crew or of passengers the radio is alike required.

Here follows another difference which was perhaps suggested by some testimony in the Titanic inquiry, to the effect that the single operator on the California, the boat nearest the Titanic, had retired for the night a little while before the catastrophe.

The radio equipment must be in charge of two or more persons skilled in the use of such apparatus, one or the other of whom shall be on duty at all times while the vessel is being navigated.

This renders obligatory a constant service.

Mr. President, we can not overstate the great advance made in securing safety at sea by this wonderful invention. Now, when a boat is crippled, when she is in danger of sinking, she is no longer in the midst of an isolated portion of the deep, but by the wireless call she may render available for her assistance other boats, and usually at short notice. The interval between the distress call and the arrival of the relief ship in the case of the Titanic and the Volturmo alike was about four hours. It is probable that in most instances on trans-Atlantic routes and on other frequented routes the time between giving the distress call and the arrival of succor would be materially less than that.

So, first of all, Mr. President, there has been this great development of wireless regulated by statute of the United States and by international convention in such a manner as to secure the very best utilization of this great invention.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. As the Senator has given the subject so much study, I should like to be informed by him on one point. Is there any provision of any kind for an inspection of the wireless before boats leave port?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; there is.

Mr. KENYON. Is that a matter of statute or of departmental regulation?

Mr. BURTON. It is a matter of statute. Under the Commissioner of Navigation there are, I believe, 10 wireless inspectors, and it must be said for them that they have done excellent service. In one instance they pointed out that the battery which had furnished the subsidiary power was not in good working order. In another instance they took off a boat a wireless operator who was not competent. They have developed excellent capacity for this work; they have exercised their authority with proper discretion, and have accomplished the best of results.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me to be somewhat germane to what the Senator from Ohio is stating at that point to say that Capt. Inch, who was in charge of the Volturmo, has been visiting in my native city at New London, Conn., recently, and night before last he delivered a lecture to a social organization there. He then read the report which he intends to make to the British Board of Trade, and I read in a newspaper yesterday a statement about it, which was that the Carmania was about 50 miles distant.

Mr. BURTON. Rather more than that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is, as the newspaper stated it. The statement continued that within five minutes after the sending out of his call for help he received the answer from the Carmania that they were at that distance and would come to him at the rate of 19 knots an hour. So the Senator from Ohio can figure it for himself. I do not know what time elapsed before the Carmania actually did arrive, but that is the statement that I saw.

Mr. BURTON. Just imagine, Mr. President, what a thrill would go through a boat filled with passengers, with the fire coming up from the hold, leaping well up on the mast, thinking they were doomed to be burned to death, when the wireless brings back a flash in five minutes, "We are coming"; and they were coming as rapidly as they could.

The second very material advance that has been made is in the adoption of a salvage convention for assistance and salvage at sea. This is termed "Treaty series No. 576." It was signed at Brussels September 23, 1910. This treaty also was presented to the Senate by me and ratified on the 18th of January, 1912. It makes compulsory the rendering of assistance at sea; that is, when there is a call by a boat in distress, unless, of course, there are conditions such that it is practically impossible, another boat must come to its assistance. This treaty also gives a compensation to the salvors of human life. There are a number of other features in it, but I pick out these two as the most important.

A bill drawn in pursuance of this convention, which I presented to the Senate, became a law on the 1st of August, 1912. There is a third provision in it which does not assume very great importance, although it comes first in the statute.

It had been ruled that when a boat had assisted another boat belonging to the same line there could be no claim for remuneration. That deprived the sailors of any claim for salvage. So the bill provides:

That the right to remuneration for assistance or salvage services shall not be affected by common ownership of the vessels rendering and receiving such assistance or salvage services.

Also:

SEC. 2. That the master or person in charge of a vessel shall, so far as he can do so without serious danger to his own vessel, crew, or passengers, render assistance to every person who is found at sea in danger of being lost; and if he fails to do so, he shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

SEC. 3. That salvors of human life, who have taken part in the services rendered on the occasion of the accident giving rise to salvage, are entitled to a fair share of the remuneration awarded to the salvors of the vessel, her cargo, and accessories.

Prior to that, Mr. President, the law of salvage seemed only to recognize a claim for compensation when property was saved. Very properly this affords encouragement to save human life and gives compensation therefor.

Mr. President, while I have never claimed that this bill brought forward last winter, which passed the Senate and was agreed to by the other House, was a perfect bill, I want to say—and I say it without fear of contradiction—that it made greater advance in providing for the welfare of the seamen and for ameliorating their condition than any legislation and all legislation passed in the last 30 years for the benefit of those on the sea.

In the first place it clearly defined their hours, on most vessels limited to two watches, those on the deck, limited to three watches those engaged in the fire hold; it limited their hours of labor on land to nine hours; except when absolutely necessary it exempted them from labor on Sundays and legal holidays. It made more careful provision for the payment of their wages; it made provision so that members of the crew, independent of the officers, could make a claim for the examination and the survey of the vessel in case the supplies or food were not proper or in case there were grounds to believe the boat was not seaworthy. It removed the inhibition concerning contracts for the payment of wages, and entitled a seaman, on giving 48 hours' notice, to demand that half his wages be paid in any port of the United States. It also provided for better quarters than before.

It is true that on the great majority of the merchant lines as much space is provided as any of these bills demand. The bill as reported by the committee made compulsory on new construction 120 cubic feet, and a hospital if there be a certain number of men. It provided also for sufficient facilities for washing. It established a standard, and made a requirement for lifeboat hands. Last of all it proposed to wipe out the statute relating to the arrest of foreign seamen in our country or the arrest of our seamen in foreign countries for desertion.

I presume every member of the Senate committee last winter in some things would have liked to go further, but we can not revolutionize this whole system at one stroke. In any event, we must adopt improvements gradually; we must take into account that we have a merchant marine which at least in the foreign trade has unfortunately been languishing for years, which is maintained to-day at almost insuperable disadvantages in comparison with the merchant marine of foreign countries. The maritime trade of the United States can not be severed from that of other countries, because we are placed in competition with them; and that, however humane we may desire to be, we can not, without driving our boats out of the trans-Pacific or the trans-Atlantic trade, frame legislation without taking into account the regulations which pertain to foreign shipping.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Ohio does he contemplate in his argument to consider the conflict, if there be any, of the provisions of this bill with any of the treaties now pending?

Mr. BURTON. I intend to go into that if I have time.

Mr. LEWIS. That being so, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator now with the questions that I have in mind.

Mr. BURTON. I thank the Senator from Illinois for the suggestion. I intend to go into that at very considerable length. I must say that I repel the insinuation that this committee last winter did not give careful consideration to the claims of the seamen.

Every member of the subcommittee, if he had any partialities, extended those partialities for the seamen; but we were not willing to take a bill brought in by their representatives, paid to represent them here, and pass it through the Senate in toto. We conducted hearings for five or six weeks. As regards the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and myself, and in a measure the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and other members of the Senate Committee on Commerce, it may be said that the greatest task we had last winter was to listen to the different delegations, giving an equal opportunity to all, so that when they were through seamen and owners alike expressed their thanks to the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce, and said they had never before had so good an opportunity to be heard.

From all these hearings we made up a bill, not the bill of the vessel owners—it was impossible to please them—not the bill of the seamen—it was impossible to entirely please them—but a bill which seemed to us just under all the circumstances. I may say that in the measure as we acted upon it, in certainly four-fifths of the disputed provisions we accepted the contention of the seamen.

So, Mr. President, it is altogether wrong to say that Congress has been derelict in its duty; it is altogether wrong to say that we have not made great advance in the last few years. The bill to which I have referred failed to become a law after it had passed the Senate and after the House concurred in it, because it was presented to President Taft less than an hour before the expiration of his term. As I understand, one of his Cabinet officers favored signing the bill and another opposed it. The President came to the conclusion, for which he can not be blamed, that it was too much to ask of him to sign a bill of so much importance within three-quarters of an hour or half an hour of the close of his term of office.

I want to make a criticism of this so-called seamen's bill, which, as has been stated, has been pending for 20 years. Until the Titanic disaster there was not a word in it about lifeboats. It is maintained that we have been derelict because we did not take the bill up and pass it before; that human life has been endangered by delay. If we had adopted in toto that bill as it was introduced in 1911, there would not have been one single paragraph in it about lifeboats or lifeboat drills. It would for the most part have been a bill in regard to the definition of the term "able seaman" and in regard to the number of able seamen on the boats. Then, of course, because of that terrible disaster everyone was aroused. Now, in the face of all this legislation, in the face of all this effort, in the face of the fact that our executive department is appointing its most expert men to consider every proposition relating to safety at sea, in the face of the fact that our supervising inspectors are making new regulations and enforcing them more strictly, in face of the still further fact that all nations have been called upon to gather and consider these questions by our invitation, it is claimed that it is this bill only that points toward safety at sea. Yet the only thing in it which is really insisted upon or on which reliance is placed is the provision in regard to three years' service constituting an able seaman. I spoke somewhat briefly of that last night, and if I have time I shall speak of it further to-day.

Now, Mr. President, I want to consider a second general point. Out of all this discussion what should be our conclusion concerning requirements for safety at sea? First of all, and supreme above all, I would place hull construction and the seaworthiness of the vessel. Lifeboats, though essential, would prove in most instances a futile reliance for saving human life. If possible, the hull should be a double one, at least, if the vessel is engaged in the passenger trade and on routes such as those across the Atlantic and the Pacific or where large distances are involved. There should at any rate be a double bottom. Most of the boats have that already.

In the destruction of the Titanic, to which much attention was given, there were a number of exceptional features, three to which blame attaches—the speed at sea, which was beyond the limit of safety in a locality where it was known there was ice; second, the insufficient supply of lifeboats; and, third, although this did not assume any great importance, the lack of drill of the crew, due largely to the fact that they had for the first time been called together. As I have said, there were most exceptional circumstances attending that disaster which stand out very prominently and make it exceptional among marine disasters—No. 1, the glancing blow. In the construction of vessels it is expected that any collision that occurs will be at the prow or at the side, and that the injury which is caused will be from breaking into the hull at the side or breaking the hull at the prow. This was a rip along the side, because the boat hit an iceberg, and the rough edges of the iceberg were sufficient to tear a hole in the hull.

It seems as if it were impossible in railroad construction, or indeed any other construction, to foresee absolutely every contingency which may happen. A few years ago on a railroad, whose officers thought they had the very best equipment to avoid accidents, a freight train meeting a passenger train caused an accident by the breaking of one of the axles on one of the freight cars, so that the freight car fell over the other track and collided with the passenger train. A somewhat similar accident happened on another line not much later. Some very large timbers were left on a freight car. I suppose they were thought to have been carefully loaded; but one of them got loose and caused a collision with a passenger train and great loss of life. After each catastrophe steps are taken to prevent its recurrence, but it seems as if there were a certain rule of chance that an accident will not recur again, but another of a dissimilar nature will occur. There probably never was an accident before quite like the one which caused the loss of life on the Titanic.

It is useless to conjecture, but it is probable that if the course of the Titanic had not been changed, and she had gone head-on against that iceberg, however rapid her speed, she would still have floated.

Another exceptional fact with regard to the Titanic, which probably will not happen again save in a very inconsiderable fraction of cases, was the smooth sea at the time, so as to make it altogether easy to launch and manage lifeboats.

What are some of the important points in boat construction besides those I have named? We can not come to the double hull immediately. Not all boats can be built in that way. The expense is too considerable to require it in every instance, but we shall probably come to it gradually. In addition to that there are other things already insisted upon very generally in passenger steamers, among which is the building of transverse bulkheads or construction so as to divide the ship into compartments, with a stronger or collision bulkhead in front.

The Titanic was well supplied with these. She had 15, and if only two of her compartments had been flooded she no doubt would have floated. But it appears that the rip went along the side of the vessel, and, according to the account of one person who claims to have been an eyewitness of the last point of the injury, five compartments were pierced. According to another theory, water flowed into only two of the bulkheads, but one of them was so weak that it gave way, and the water flowed into another, and then the next bulkhead gave way; and so, little by little, the ship was flooded.

Our regulations already require that in these passenger steamers there shall be three transverse bulkheads. They should be strong. They should be carefully tried. They should extend a certain distance above the water line, as determined by the maximum load of the boat. They should go to a deck which is tight, so that the water can not pour up above that deck. These are all matters of detail which must be considered carefully, and not, as I think, by a congressional committee in the first instance, nor by the Senate, but by men who have given their lives to the study of ship construction, the strength of materials, and the seaworthiness of ships.

On the subject of the comparative importance of bulkheads and lifeboats the leading British expert on safety of life at sea, Sir William Henry White, who died a short time ago, said:

There has been strong criticism lately of the official regulations for boats in passenger ships. The writer does not propose to take part in that controversy in this communication. He ventures, however, to predict that when natural, but temporary, excitement has disappeared, and when calmer consideration of the subject becomes possible, it will be seen that the question of boat equipment, important as it undoubtedly is, must be treated as subordinate to that of efficient water-tight subdivision.

Possibly the time is approaching when shipowners will concur in action by which such subdivision shall be made the subject of legislation on lines to be agreed upon by the board of trade and themselves. In view of the experience gained in connection with boat lines of merchant ships it is permissible to hope that if such action is taken it may be of an international character, and that arrangement would undoubtedly be most advantageous if it could be made.

I would rank next to the construction of the hull measures for the prevention of fire. A great variety of articles are put together in the cargo of a ship. The fires in the furnaces must be maintained at a very high heat. What should be first provided against is combustibility of the ship itself, and next combustibility of the cargo. I am glad to say that we have gone much further than other countries in provisions relating to the cargo of the boat. Section 4472 of our Revised Statutes, as amended in 1905, and I believe also in 1906, deals with this subject. This is the main section on fire prevention, although there are others equally strict:

No loose hay, loose cotton, or loose hemp, camphene, nitroglycerin, naphtha, benzine, benzol, coal oil, crude or refined petroleum, or other like explosive burning fluids or like dangerous articles—shall be carried as freight or used as stores on any steamer carrying passengers; nor shall baled cotton or hemp be carried on such steamers unless the bales are compactly pressed and thoroughly covered and secured in such manner as shall be prescribed by the regulations established by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

A general blanket expression—

I will perhaps have printed in my remarks the whole of this section, though I do not wish to detain the Senate at this time by reading further from it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will yield.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. That is already a law, and it is enforced?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; very strictly enforced, too.

Mr. LANE. Yet, as I understand, here is a ship, the Volturno, which just had a fire aboard of her and lost a number of lives, for the reason, as I am informed by the press dispatches, that there were loose chemicals on board which started a fire.

Mr. BURTON. Ah, but she was loaded on the other side. She was not under the control of our laws.

Mr. LANE. This law only protects our own ships?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and foreign ships as well—

Mr. LANE. When they sail from here?

Mr. BURTON. When they sail from the United States.

Mr. LANE. All these chemicals are imported and we export none, so that that provision is of no use to our people coming to America from the other side?

Mr. BURTON. No. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that his statement emphasizes in a most impressive manner the fact that this matter can be settled only by international agreement. Whatever regulations we may make will be binding only in our own ports. I suppose by a great stretch of authority we could say that a boat would not be received here unless she conformed to those requirements, but that would not be practicable.

Mr. LANE. It seems to me this country ought to be able to require that American citizens returning to this country from other countries, from business trips or otherwise, should be allowed to come here safely. If there is any navigation company which is transporting them in an unsafe manner, it ought to be within the power of this country to see that they are safeguarded. It seems to me that is a prerogative of this country. I may be mistaken, and it may be that some treaty would waive that; but that is a sort of inherent right of a nation.

Mr. BURTON. Treaties stand in the way; the general law stands in the way. The impracticability of making regulations also prevents this, though I do not discover in any correspondence objection on the part of foreign countries to establishing and maintaining high standards in that regard. We have gone rather further than others.

There should be the most careful provision in the way of fire apparatus for quenching any fire when it starts. The engineers and crew should be most carefully trained in this regard.

Mr. President, I fear that the greatest danger of the future, at least on the larger vessels, is to be from fire. So great is the variety of articles transported and so considerable the possibility of their being ignited in some way that the greatest danger is from this source rather than from any other.

Next I would place the necessity for lifeboat equipment and qualifications of boatmen.

What have we here in the bill that is presented as a substitute by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]? I wish to call attention to one provision in section 2 which seems to me almost criminal in its bearing upon the subject. It is found in lines 11 and 12 on page 2:

Seamen serving in one department of a vessel shall not be required to do duty in another department.

What does that mean, Mr. President? When read in connection with the requirement of two lifeboat hands, it means that the task of manning lifeboats and saving life must be restricted to those lifeboat hands, who, it is said, are required to be able seamen. No steward, no engineer, no fireman can be compelled to take part in any drill in this regard. Why, it is as if you said that when an accident happens to a railroad train none but the fireman and the locomotive engineer shall take part in the saving of life; that the brakeman shall do nothing. True, it is said in the bill, and it will be claimed, that when there is a special emergency they shall all be called upon; but that is not an answer. They must be trained beforehand, or their services will be practically useless in this regard.

What is the situation? Boats on the ocean and boats on the Lakes, the inland seas, carry a certain number of sailors on the deck. Their duties are very important, especially those who are at the wheel or on the lookout; but the other sailors have very little employment which requires any considerable degree of skill. They may not be disciplined in the use of boats. They may not even be handy in the use of boats. On that subject I wish to point out this fact:

When a lifeboat is lowered into the sea, the two able seamen would go down with the boat. But the most important thing to be accomplished in the lowering of the boat is not going down with the passengers to the water; it is handling the boat at the top. The important thing is the efficiency of the men who manage the pulleys and ropes around the davits that let down the boat. You might have two men who were seamen very well versed in the use of oars and familiar with the sea; but unless you had efficient men at the top, the passengers might be all spilled out from the boat. It might go down more rapidly on one side than on the other, or it might swing like a pendulum against the side of the hull. So a mere provision of two boatmen is not sufficient. You should have a whole crew, including sailors, stewards, engineers, and firemen, who are able to take care of the management and lowering of boats.

Again, generally speaking, I think the importance of facility in the use of oars has been somewhat exaggerated, because, in this day of wireless telegraphy, if passengers or crew were transferred from a large steamer to a small boat at sea what would they do? They would not row around to find land, because the wireless would have summoned other vessels to come near. The small boat would stay near the abandoned steamer—as near as it could—so that the relieving vessel would find them.

Thus, while the use of oars is a very important thing, and I will not by any means decry it, it is not the leading requisite. The main thing is the handling of the mechanism, which an engineer in the hold, or probably a fireman, or maybe a steward, but certainly an engineer, would understand a great deal better than a seaman, I do not care if he has served 10 years before the mast.

It is not a matter of looking on the sea and judging of its moods, as has been said; it is a matter of handling mechanism and seeing that the boat goes down on an even keel, that it is carefully manipulated and is not fouled in any way.

I will include in my remarks a part of the account of Capt. Inch in regard to the Volturmo. He says, in regard to the lowering of boats:

The first boats swung out were the three lifeboats on the starboard side.

Chief Officer Miller went into the first boat with 20 cabin passengers and 10 members of the crew, the 10 who belonged to the boat's crew. That boat wasn't smashed. The trouble was that in lowering it caught in the tackle and was turned over under the gunwale. Everybody in it was spilled out.

That is, they did not have sufficient skill, apparently, in handling it from the deck.

But the boat righted itself, and I saw Mr. Miller and five or six others climb back into it. I am afraid the rest were drowned. The second boat put off was No. 6, in charge of Fourth Officer Langsell, an Austrian. This boat contained 40 steerage passengers and a crew of about 10. It got away safely.

It seems now, though, that both this boat and the boat containing the first officer and a few more were lost in the storm.

Bear in mind that there were 10 men of the crew put down in the first boat. Ten men of the crew also were put down in the second boat.

The third boat was in charge of Boatswain Soderstrom. It was No. 7. The boat struck the sea all right, but the wash carried it under the quarter, and the ship literally sat down on it. It was crushed into a mass of splinters. About 50 steerage passengers and members of the crew were lost. The boatswain managed to cling to the tackle by a spring from the stern sheets. He climbed back on the ship and worked at my side when we were fighting those devilish flames.

The boats were in good condition and so was the tackle. They had been inspected in New York within two months and in Rotterdam under the Dutch regulations. I stopped lowering boats then, because all of the trained men were gone and because it seemed hopeless to try to fight such a sea. There was a 15-foot drop from the boat deck to the water, and it was taking frightful chances to lower boats.

That was not a great distance from the boat to the water; not as much as it would usually be.

Here is an explanation of how some of the other members of the crew were lost, given later in the interview:

The watch below had been at breakfast. The first explosion and rush of flame had caught those poor fellows and burned them to death where they sat or while they were trying to struggle toward the open. They didn't have a chance on earth.

About 15 lifeboats would carry every passenger upon that boat, for the average is about 50 apiece. Suppose you were to adopt this bill, two able seamen to each boat, so that there would be 30 of them for lifeboats, and you were to put in this provision that no one in any other department shall be compelled to be trained in the handling of lifeboats, with 10 for the first boat, 10 for the second boat, 10 for the third boat put down into the sea, none would be left who have any training. So I say, Mr. President—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THORNTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not entirely certain that I understand the statement of the Senator from Ohio with reference to the provision that seamen serving in one department of a vessel shall not be required to do duty in another department. My own understanding of that language would be that an engineer, for example, could not be compelled to do duty upon deck, and a fireman could not be compelled to act as a steward; but does the Senator think it means that the captain of a ship could not compel the entire crew to undergo such drills as might be necessary to enable them in time of need to maneuver the vessel or to save life? In this connection I call the Senator's attention to the language which follows:

But these provisions—

Meaning all the provisions that precede—

but these provisions shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy.

That would seem to do away with the provision in the cases which are mentioned, and whenever any occasion should arise for the maneuvering of the vessel by the entire crew the captain could command the services of all, no matter in what department they are engaged. If he thinks it is necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or to save life on board another vessel he can command the services of the entire crew, no matter in what department they are employed. That being so, does it not necessarily follow that it would be in the power of the captain to compel men to submit to such drill and instructions as would be necessary to enable them to perform that duty in case of need?

Mr. BURTON. No; because this refers distinctly to the condition of an emergency, maneuvering the vessel, or performing work necessary for the safety of the vessel; that is, he can call them out in time of emergency, in the case of a storm, when the vessel itself is in danger or when another vessel is in danger, for the saving of life on another boat, but when it comes to training them for that work you have here a provision that the lifeboats shall have two able seamen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does not say there shall not be any others except that. That, it occurs to me, is a minimum provision.

Mr. BURTON. There would be the right to call on the other sailors or deck hands besides the two for each lifeboat, but not those in another department.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am trying to get at the Senator's view of it. The distinct language of the provision is, if I may paraphrase it a bit, that when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or the whole crew are needed for this specific purpose their service may be required.

Mr. BURTON. It is not when all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew are needed, but it is all the sailors or all the firemen. That does not refer to the training that precedes. It is not an easy thing to drill a seaman so that he will be thoroughly adept in an emergency; it takes a good deal of time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My question is this: I think the Senator agrees with the suggestion which I make as to the construction of the language to the effect that in the cases of need specified here the entire crew can be called upon to render these services irrespective of the department in which they may be employed. But the Senator seems to think that while in a case of need that may be done, the captain is powerless to instruct the entire crew so as to enable them to render that service.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and in the bill which was framed by the Senate committee last winter a provision for compulsory lifeboat drills in port was most strenuously resisted by the advocates of the La Follette substitute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course I know nothing about that.

Mr. BURTON. It is on the general theory that each department should be as far as possible separate, and that there should be sailors enough to take charge of the boats or anything pertaining to the navigation of the vessel. It is on that general theory. It is perfectly clear what the theory is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The query in my mind was this: The provision is that seamen serving in one department shall not be required to do duty in another department—that they shall not be interchanged. I am not certain about my own construction of it, but I submit it to the Senator. It seems to me that that would mean that the seaman in one department could not be called upon to do ordinary duty in another department.

Mr. BURTON. That is, in the ordinary course of things?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the ordinary course of things. But that language standing alone, as it seems to me, would certainly not prevent the training of these men to respond to this supreme call whenever it came to save life, to save the ship. I can see nothing in the language—

Mr. BURTON. Certainly it means that they shall not be required to do duty in another department, and the whole object of the bill is to separate the sailing department from all the rest. What is the objection, if that be true, to putting in stewards or engineers or firemen to take charge of these boats if they show superior competency? Does it not logically come to that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand the language it would include those. It says either sailors or firemen or the whole crew. The whole crew certainly includes the stewards and everyone else.

Mr. BURTON. Why is the provision so carefully set forth over here in section 12 on page 16?—

unless she shall have sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seamen or higher.

Why does it not say men who are competent, in whatever department they are found?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not discussing that particular feature of it. It does not seem to me to bear upon the question I submitted to the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. They are very closely coupled.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As it occurs to me, the reason for a provision of that kind would be that then you would have a definite standard by which these men are to be tested. When you say that you shall have a man of sufficient skill you have left the standard open to somebody's discretion, to somebody's judgment; but when you say that he shall be an able seaman then you have a definite requirement. He must be a man who has served three years upon the sea or upon the Great Lakes, and he must be not less than 19 years of age. Then you have a definite standard established; but when you say that a man shall be of sufficient skill you have an indefinite provision. That is the way it occurs to me. But I come back to the other proposition—

Mr. BURTON. I should like very much to continue, but if the Senator desires to ask any further question I will yield. I have already, it seems to me, given my views clearly on that subject. If the Senator desires to ask any further question, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The only further question I was going to submit to the Senator was whether under this language of the first section that seamen serving in one department shall not be required to perform duty in another department there is anything affirmative which would prevent the training of all the crew to respond to this call in the case of a supreme emergency?

Mr. BURTON. In an emergency of that kind, of course he can call them all out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is there anything in the bill which would prevent their being instructed or trained so as to be able to meet that emergency?

Mr. BURTON. It points—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will bear with me for just a moment, in other words, the training of a steward to assist in the handling of a lifeboat would not be to employ him in a separate department. It would be to train him for a special service in case of emergency.

Mr. BURTON. I beg pardon. What did the Senator say just at the close?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say to compel a steward, for example, in connection with other members of the crew to engage in work for the purpose of training him in the handling of a lifeboat and to go into drills would not be to employ him in another department, but it would be to fit him to perform a duty which under the law he should be compelled to perform.

Mr. BURTON. The provisions is that there shall be a number of able seamen upon each boat, and the whole theory of the bill is to divide up the different duties. For instance, there has been much controversy about allowing or compelling sailors to assist in unloading at ports. Where a boat goes to an out-of-the-way port, query, can you ask the sailor to do anything in the way of unloading? That is what is behind this whole class of legislation for restricting work to one department. It has its merits in many cases; but I say the men who are in the engineer's department and the firemen and in the steward's department ought to be required to take the drill.

In this connection I wish to say that the drill should be as well in port as out at sea. Neither can be sufficient without the other. Seamen generally are very bitterly opposed to the requirement of drill in port, and, generally speaking, vessel owners do not want any drill out at sea.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BRADLEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. As I understand the language of the bill, it prohibits the employment of seamen in different departments. Now, if you take the seamen in all the departments and undertake to drill them and require them in the act of drilling to perform duties in the department to which they belong, does not that section of the bill prevent the drilling of the seamen?

Mr. BURTON. Clearly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. On that particular point I should like to have the Senator state wherein the bill reported by the committee is any different from the substitute as far as the training of the seamen is concerned.

Mr. BURTON. That is not in the bill as reported by the committee as I recall it.

Mr. NORRIS. No; this is the language:

And seamen serving in one department of a vessel shall not be required to do duty in another department.

That is in the substitute but not in the committee bill.

Mr. BURTON. It is not in the committee bill.

Mr. NORRIS. The question I ask is wherein is there any difference in the two bills as far as the training of the crew is concerned?

Mr. BURTON. Because under the bill as reported by the committee there would be absolute liberty and authority to call on a man and to train a man for any service connected with the management of the boat, the safety of life, or anything of that kind, while this inserts a prohibition on that and divides the crew into different departments.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe that this language would prohibit, for instance, the master from requiring a fireman, let us say, to train in the management and the lowering of a lifeboat?

Mr. BURTON. Most decidedly; that is, he could not be required to do it. It does not go so far as to prevent him from volunteering to do it if he wants to.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator would really construe this language, it seems to me, so as to nullify it. Now, the language following says:

But these provisions—

That is, the one I have just read and others—

but these provisions shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy.

I take it that when in the judgment of the master an emergency has arisen and he calls on these men it is their duty to respond; and if he calls on a fireman to lower a lifeboat, although it is a different department, it is his duty to do it. But the Senator's construction of the bill would mean that the duty the law itself provides he must perform in case of an emergency he would not be able to perform because he could not drill for it. Does the Senator think that any court would possibly put such a construction on the law?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly. Of course, in time of emergency you can call upon every man in the boat. Indeed, you can call upon passengers as well.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. BURTON. But you can not under this provision drill him for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. It is his duty when called on in an emergency to perform whatever work the master says he shall perform. Would it not follow that it is just as important to train for that duty, if that is his duty, as any other duty in ordinary times?

Mr. BURTON. The point is that he is absolutely not required to do work outside of his particular department.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTON. That is, he is not required to serve in any service of that kind except in a case of emergency.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but that duty, when he is called upon to perform it, is a duty just the same as any other work that might be in his own department. The reason why he is to be trained for work in his own department by drill is that he may become more efficient. But here is a case of emergency, where this other duty is made supreme by law itself; and what reason is there why he should not be trained for that duty the same as any other duty?

Mr. BURTON. Because there are two special men who are selected for doing that work.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but the Senator concedes—

Mr. BURTON. They must be two able-bodied seamen, men who have served three years or more.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator would concede that a man working on deck would be trained or drilled in lowering a boat under this law?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; he might be.

Mr. NORRIS. That is because it is the duty of the man working on deck to lower a boat when called upon. Now, in case of an emergency it becomes the duty of the firemen to lower a boat. Then why can he not be trained in lowering a boat?

Mr. BURTON. Simply because they are not to be required except in the case of that emergency to do anything of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. He is trained for one, because it is his duty. Then he could be trained for the other which is admitted to be his duty just the same under an emergency.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Nebraska had been through the hearings in this case, he would have found very much opposition. There was a provision in the bill that was stricken out last session when this measure was under consideration. I consented that it be stricken out last winter just because of opposition. I think his judgment would be somewhat modified in regard to it.

Again, I wish to say that, in pursuance of what I have been saying—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator from Ohio creates a wrong impression. What he says may be quite misleading to the Senate respecting the opposition to a provision for drilling in the lifeboat service. I do not understand that any opposition has been made by those representing the seamen to any training of the men or drilling of the men in lifeboat service or any other service, except when it was proposed to make that the test of efficiency or as a substitute for the test of efficiency of able seamen on the vessel. The opposition to lifeboat drill on the part of the seamen has always been limited to making that the test or to substitute that for the standard of efficiency which is recognized by all the countries pretty nearly of the world—that is, three years' service at sea on deck.

I purpose to offer an amendment here—and I will say that it has no opposition from those representing the seamen—requiring, under the directions of the Secretary of Commerce, the framing of rules and regulations for lifeboat drill and for fire drill and for the assigning of passengers when they are booked for the sea to certain lifeboats, so that they may understand where they are to go.

The struggle regarding this provision for drilling has always been against having that take the place of a requirement that a certain number of trained seamen shall be employed upon every vessel before they depart from one of our ports. The lifeboat drill which is provided in the bill as reported might be had in the harbor, and men who never had been at sea at all might be so trained that they could make under most favorable circumstances, in a quiet sea and with a vessel at rest, such a showing with respect to swaging out a lifeboat and lowering it, and all that, as to equip themselves under the provisions of the bill as reported to be efficient lifeboat men, because that is all that is required. They are not required to have any knowledge of the sea itself. The opposition to that provision has always been upon the ground that it was proposed to substitute it for a standard of efficiency; in other words, it is against the shipping of green men, expecting to train them and give them the preliminary training in the harbor so that they could pass the inspection and be shipped as efficient lifeboat men, and then get the balance of their training at sea in lowering and manning lifeboats.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is willing to have put in here a provision for a drill of all the seamen on board for lifeboats?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will read a rough draft of an amendment which I have framed.

Mr. BURTON. And, second, I want to ask him if he is willing that there shall be an examination by inspectors to see who are the most competent of those who engage in that drill and who are best able to handle lifeboats?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not willing, Mr. President, to have anything substituted in this bill for the standard of able seamen.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, it is insisted that three years shall be the standard and the only standard. The men may be fourfold more agile—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon; that is not so, because the substitute requires not only that, but starting in on section 12, page 23, with the provision as to lifeboats, line 6—

Mr. BURTON. What is the page, once again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Page 23 of the copy where both bills are printed together.

Mr. BURTON. That is, the print with the caps?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. I think perhaps I had better read it from line 18, on page 22.

Mr. BURTON. Very good.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (reading):

Nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers, are of a rating not less than able seaman: Provided, That no vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she is provided and equipped with a sufficient number of seaworthy lifeboats to carry the transport at one time every passenger and every member of the crew licensed to be carried on board such vessel and unless she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seaman or higher who shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. BURTON. What is your amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not prepared to offer it at this time, because I will modify it.

Mr. BURTON. What is the substance of it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After the word "Commerce," on line 13, page 16, insert:

Provided further, That the Board of Supervising Inspectors be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, to be approved by the Secretary of Commerce, to provide, in harbor and at sea, for lifeboat drill and fire drill to be held for the training of the crew in fighting fire, in abandoning the vessel, and in caring for the passengers, and to provide for the assignment of each passenger to a particular place in the lifeboats, said assignment to be made at the time the person is taken aboard the vessel as a passenger, who shall thereupon be informed of such assignment. Every failure to comply with the rules and regulations authorized by this proviso shall, upon conviction, subject the master or the vessel to a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200. The provisions herein with respect to lifeboat drill, fire drill, in training the crew in fighting fire, and in abandoning the vessel, in so far as the same relates to such drill at sea, shall not apply to vessels of foreign nations. But as to foreign vessels at sea said board shall deliver to the master of every such vessel departing from a port of the United States a copy of said rules and regulations, together with a recommendation that the master of such foreign vessel comply with such rules and regulations at sea.

Mr. BURTON. I take it, Mr. President, that under our existing laws the supervising inspectors have ample power to require boat drills and fire drills as well. There is certainly no objection, though, to putting that in statutory form. I am not sure but that it would help.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And to making it obligatory upon them to enforce such regulations.

Mr. BURTON. That is, upon the master?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly, upon the master; and not only authorize but to direct the promulgation of these rules.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to examine the section, perhaps, before it is decided; but at present I see no objection to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I will perfect this and offer it later.

Mr. BURTON. The supervising inspectors last winter raised the question as to who should supervise and direct those drills. The officers of the service stated that it would be impracticable for them to take that up on any large scale because it would require so much of their time as to require additional officers and that in the first instance it should be left to the master, but with their right to make regulations and to supervise. But, Mr. President, here you are trying to fix an absolutely artificial standard. No man, except a man who has served three years on deck at sea, can fulfill this requirement. There may be an engineer fourfold more competent, there may be a fireman who is much more competent, but you must have two of these deck hands for every boat. Take such a boat as that of which I gave the illustration of yesterday as a good one to begin with—the Imperator. It would require carrying 120 extra able seamen just to comply with this provision. Take a number of our lake boats, take the boats on the Fall River Line, take the boats that ply along on the Atlantic coast, and you are imposing here a regulation under which you compel them to take a large number of extra and unnecessary men. No examination is required; there is no standard as to competency. If a man has served three years, you can accept him; but you can not put anyone else in, no matter how much more competent he may be. If there is any one thing that developed from the Titanic inquiry it was that some of the men who had served longest were least alert and least competent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Ohio can not find in this provision a line or a word that prevents the putting into one of these lifeboats of as many competent men as the vessel can carry. It simply does provide and does require that at least two able seamen shall be provided for every lifeboat.

Mr. BURTON. Yes, Mr. President, and with the great capacity of modern steamships in the trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific trade, and with that on the Lakes and on our other waters, this would require them to double and to treble, and sometimes to even quadruple, the number of seamen when they have already in the crew men who are just as competent to do this work. Not long ago the stewards of the St. Louis formed a little boat club; they challenged all comers; and in the competition they beat everyone that came along. They were athletes, as a good many of these stewards are, some being excellent football players.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They would not be barred under the provisions of this proposed substitute or of the bill as reported from being assigned to these lifeboats and from operating them and assisting in their operation.

Mr. BURTON. According to the Senator's theory, they would not be barred from being assigned in time of emergency or in a subordinate position, but they would be barred from filling this requirement of two for each lifeboat. They might be the most competent men on the boat; they might be the most permanent; they might be the best adapted for the work; but they would have, nevertheless, to go on in a position subordinate to two men who had served three years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is no reason why those men under the terms of this bill could not be assigned to the lowering of a lifeboat—one of them assigned to the bow and the other assigned to the stern. This requirement is simply that there shall be a sufficient number of able seamen, so that there can at least be two assigned to each lifeboat, but the position that they shall take in the lifeboat, or as to whether they shall be put in a subordinate position in the lifeboat, does not appear in the bill and is not dealt with at all. It would be entirely within the control of the master of the vessel to so place the men that he would get, and the passengers would get, the very best service out of each lifeboat.

Mr. BURTON. That necessarily would arise. You have prescribed by law that there shall be two able seamen. What have you done that for? It is on the theory that they are the best men for the work, that they are the men who should have charge of the boat, and that nobody else has equal competency with them.

There are several other features in regard to this subject to which I desire to advert. In the first place, to repeat in part, on any boat with a large passenger list, it requires a number of able seamen, far in excess of the whole number of seamen required on the boat for the ordinary work of navigation. It would bear down with especial weight on many of the boats on inland waters and on the Lakes.

In the next place, it has been shown by actual trial that the stewards in most instances measure up, and in many instances are superior, to the sailor men in their facility with oars. There is no better illustration of this than the one I gave yesterday. I do not know but that there were some sailors put in by the captain of the Grosser Kurfurst, but men selected were from the steward's department, the coal passers, and the firemen, who went out at the very beginning, and who were the first to save lives, 21 in number, off that boat. When the captain had the selection of the men, he selected the best men he had. Now, it is stated in this bill, no matter how competent they may be, no matter how athletic they may be—and almost always they are more permanent in the boats than are the sailors—many of the stewards on some of the boats have been there from 10 to 12 years, and have pride in their association with the boats; while the average trip of a sailor is not more than about a year; he changes—

Mr. NORRIS. They may be able seamen.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I think, inadvertently made a statement here yesterday that was open to this construction. He stated that they were available as boatmen when they had been three years on the sea; but he says there shall not be less than two men of the rating of "able seamen" or higher. Those must be men who have been on the deck, in the deck service.

I have here some figures showing the number of men in a few boats—the deck service and others. Take, for instance, the American ship, the Siberia. She has in the deck department 45, including the first officer; in all, 50. In the engineers' department she has 138; in the stewards' department, 96. You see that is the way they run. Here is a Japanese boat, the Tenyo Maru, that has in the deck department 53, including the officers; in the engineers' department, 65—the proportion is somewhat less there—in the stewards' department, called here the pursers' department, 120.

Then I have the figures on the German steamer, the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and there there are in the deck department, including all of the sailors and all of the officers, 53; in the engineers' department—they are given separately here—they number 179. Then the pursers' department on that boat is counted differently, including the cooks, etc., and of those there are 25; in the stewards' department there are 191.

So you see, according to that, the deck force is altogether the smallest, and, with the number of passengers they carry, the whole deck force would not be sufficient to man the boats.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, can the Senator from Ohio tell us how many lifeboats there are carried on the Siberia, or what would be the full complement of lifeboats?

Mr. BURTON. It is not stated here. I should fancy that the full number—I do not know, but the Senator from Utah knows better than I how large a passenger list that boat carries if she goes from the Pacific coast—I should fancy that there would be about 40 lifeboats.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be right, but I should think not, because on the ship that was lost last year, the White Star liner, the Titanic, the full complement of lifeboats was only 34 on that great ship, as I understand.

Mr. BURTON. Well, but she did not have nearly enough.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Her full complement, however, would have only been 34.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If she had had a sufficient number for every soul on board, she would only have had 34.

Mr. BURTON. Not quite. She at times would certainly have more than 2,000, including the steerage and all. She carries about 700 first-class passengers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Something over 2,200 altogether.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. She had on board, if the Senator will permit me, 2,201 people at the time of the disaster.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but that was on her first trip.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was with a crew of 885. Thirty-four lifeboats would have carried everybody, and under the substitute bill it would have required 68 sailors to man them.

Mr. BURTON. Let me call attention to another matter. Sixty to a lifeboat, I think, are too many.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, it depends on the size of the lifeboat.

Mr. BURTON. I can tell what this bill will result in. There is a recent report here—if I have time I may possibly read from it, but at this moment I can not put my hands upon it—in which the largest-sized lifeboat is condemned and lifeboats which carry about 50, or from 50 to 60, are preferred. The result of this would be that large and perhaps unwieldy lifeboats would be placed upon the ships, and that is a point to be considered in regard to any legislation of this kind.

A lifeboat—what is it? There are lifeboats and lifeboats. There is one type, known as the Lundin, a collapsible, which carries 75 people on a length of 28 feet. The Englehardt carries about 54. The lifeboats which are used on the Lakes carry only about 18 to 20. That is the size most adapted to them. How are you going to harmonize any such regulation as this with all those different sizes of lifeboats?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio, who lives, as I do, upon the Lakes, have we not a regulation or law under which a department of our Government can pass upon the question as to what will conform with the requirements?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; if the Senator from Illinois will remind me of that later, I want to dwell on that somewhat fully, and I may reach it very soon.

Mr. LEWIS. I felt that that removed the embarrassment to which the Senator has adverted.

Mr. BURTON. See right here the indefiniteness of this provision. If a lifeboat carries 20 people, each must have two able seamen; if it carries the maximum capacity, which is between 70 and 80, then the requirement is the same. Each must also have two able seamen.

There is one other provision here that I do not altogether like to talk against, because it seems so reasonable, which has been put into this bill for the first time, one which has been in no preceding bill and which, if it were generally known, would raise an outcry that would certainly come in very strong language to the Senate. I refer to the following provision:

Provided, That no vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she is provided and equipped with a sufficient number of seaworthy lifeboats to carry and transport at one time every passenger and every member of the crew licensed to be carried on board such vessel.

That is absolutely new. Mr. President, that would put many excursion boats out of business. I do not know but that it would be best to have them stay in port at New York on the hot days and not go out to Coney Island; but they could not comply with that requirement. Excursion boats run from Boston and on the inland waters from Detroit and Sandusky. Why could they not comply with that requirement? The supervising inspectors have, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis], very carefully considered that matter. They have allowed, to a certain extent, rafts to be substituted where the vessels operate near land. They say this: "Take a great excursion boat with, say, 2,000 people on her. If a panic should arise, a lifeboat would not do any good. The passengers would rush over to the boats and trample upon each other. The only recourse in that case are another boat coming alongside or life preservers." It is a pretty bad alternative, I am frank to say, and I do not like to stand up here and criticize a provision of that kind, because, at first sight it seems right; but the inspectors and others who have examined into the question have greatly modified the requirements for long-distance voyages in this respect. They have relieved excursion boats from this provision. Where a boat sails in shallow waters, where her hull would not be submerged in case she sank, they have substituted for lifeboats other appliances for saving life, such as rafts. If you are going to go this far with all boats outside of harbors and rivers, I do not see why you should not include the rivers and the harbors as well.

According to the statistics in the Statistical Abstract the number of lives lost on the rivers is about as great, notwithstanding the traffic is immeasurably less, as it is on the Lakes. The worst disaster in the history of American vessels was the one which befell the General Slocum. And where did it happen? In a river and in a harbor both. So, under the provisions of the proposed substitute, it would cut out excursion boats. Suppose a ship rounds a headland; if she keeps near to land, is she in any worse position than coming down in the deep portion of the Hudson River?

All this goes to show how impracticable it is to pass a bill of this kind, made up of generalities. There is an infinite diversity in our ships—in size, in propulsive power, in the distance they go, in the number of passengers they carry, and whether they go by day or by night. I want to say if there is anyone who thinks he can frame a general law that will cover all these cases, I should certainly salute him as a person of the very greatest and highest degree of wisdom. I do not believe it can be done. I do not believe you can frame satisfactory or fair general provisions as to the number of lifeboats. I do not believe you can frame provisions requiring able seamen to take care of lifeboats that will not be utterly impracticable.

In this connection, Mr. President, if this bill were to pass, the requirement that 40 per cent of the deck crew the first year must be able seamen is, on most of the passenger boats, a bagatelle in comparison with the requirement that there shall be two able seamen for each lifeboat. Complaint enough is made of the first provision, but the requirement of two able seamen for each lifeboat would so strain the demands for able seamen that you could not find them in the country.

People sometimes say we delay passing bills. Well, we had an illustration last winter. I favored the manning bill, then under consideration. That applied to about 300 boats, whereas this bill would apply to about 3,000. I most cordially favored the requirement for an additional mate, making three mates on one class of boats, and two mates on another. Well, the vessel owners wanted to obtain under that bill about 250 extra mates, but they have not gotten them up to this time. There are probably some two hundred boats and tugs which have been or are amenable to fine because they have not complied with that law. The law was passed to take effect immediately. They could not, however, find the men. Representatives of the union and of the vessel owners got together and talked the matter over amicably. Both recognized the situation, and, as I am informed by a man who was present—and I believe the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was present at one of those conferences—the question was asked by the owners of the ships, "How much do you want for those mates? What wages?" "Seventy dollars a month." "All right." One owner said, "We will take 20"; another said this number and another said that number, but hardly a man could be furnished to go into the service. We passed that bill with the best of intentions. I joined in reporting it. It provided that on a tug there should be an extra mate, but on Long Island Sound and everywhere else where they are searching for them they can hardly find a man who will go on as mate. He does not like the job.

If that is true in regard to that bill, which only required 250 additional men, what will be true in regard to this bill, when heretofore there has not been any such classification as "able seaman"? It has never existed; but, like a bolt out of the clear sky, you propose to create it now, and within 90 days compel every boat to have all this equipment.

Mr. President and Senators, it would be absolutely impossible. There is not a requirement in regard to manning boats by able seamen in any country of the world, except Australia. They have the grade of able seamen in England and Norway, in France and in Germany, but they do not make a requirement that a certain proportion of the crew shall be able seamen. In Australia they do in the coastwise trade; but if a boat comes from England or from Hongkong, they do not compel her to be manned with able seamen in this way; they leave her alone. There are conflicting reports about the result; one is that it has greatly increased the cost of operation.

I desire to return a moment to the idea of three years' service being necessary to constitute an able seaman. Oftentimes the young fellow who has been in the service six months or three months shows far greater facility than the man who has been in the service for three years. A man who has served three years on the deck of a boat can apply to be a mate; and those who are most progressive and able take the examination for mate.

In some parts of the country, particularly on the Great Lakes, during the years when the shipping has been increasing so rapidly, almost anyone of ability who has served three years can get a license as mate or first assistant engineer, and be appointed; indeed, under the regulations, a man does not have to serve three years, the time required to become a boatman under the substitute bill, to get a mate's certificate on rivers and inland waters; after two years a man may go to the inspectors and take the examination for mate; but here you are putting in this impracticable and unreasonable requirement that on every boat that crosses the ocean, on every boat that goes outside of a river or harbor, there shall be two able seamen of three years' service on every lifeboat. No matter how competent a man of less service may be, he is to be turned down. You say to them, "You do not fill the bill; we will have some one who has been at sea three years."

What is the fair test? Examine these men as to their skill—stewards, firemen, whatever they may be. This country does not think favorably of a limitation of time. What it regards is capacity and ability. I think I would myself favor a certain amount of time at sea. I do not believe in bringing in a harbor rat, letting him take the examination, and go right out as a boat hand. I believe a "harbor rat" means a man who sticks close to the harbor and never goes to sea. But to say that a man has got to serve three years, and then prescribe no other qualification, except to direct that he shall be drilled, is not only unreasonable, but it is fraught with danger.

One other point I wish to make about this matter of lifeboats. That provision will have to be examined with a good deal of care. We can not afford—

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio has said several times that certain things in this bill ought to be examined with a great deal of care—examined by whom?

Mr. BURTON. Examined by a legislative committee in connection with men who are expert in the handling of nautical affairs, ships, and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has not that been in progress for 15 or 20 years?

Mr. BURTON. Well, I do not know about that. The committee last winter tried to bring before them the officers of the Government who have to do with nautical affairs; and in the bill which we framed last winter we sought, so far as possible, to follow their suggestions.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I really want to know is, has not this matter been under agitation, under discussion, and under consideration for 15 or 20 years or more?

Mr. BURTON. Just what was desired has assumed a different form every few years. As I said this morning, this so-called seamen's bill contained nothing about lifeboats or lifeboat hands until 1912, after the Titanic disaster.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me the time has come to do something. We ought to make some progress. If we have had the subject under consideration for nearly a quarter of a century, somebody ought to have a rather definite and intelligent notion of what should be done. But that really is not what I rose to ask the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Just one minute. I want to say, as I said the other day, that the great difficulty in this legislation has been the antagonism between the two elements, both of them making unusual demands. I wish they could be placed in a room as a jury is and told: "You will stay there until you come to some agreement." I do not suppose, however, that they would reach any agreement even then.

Mr. CUMMINS. The chief difficulty, I presume, has been that it would cost the shipowners something, and they do not want to pay the additional cost. That is the real difficulty.

Mr. BURTON. With unanimous voice they deny that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But just see what the Senator said a few moments ago about the bill that was passed last winter, and the inability of certain shipowners to secure the third mate. They would have no difficulty in securing him if they would pay him sufficient wages, would they?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, by no means.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then it is a mere matter of whether or not they are willing to pay enough to him.

Mr. BURTON. That was what I tried to make clear. They could not get him at all. There are three associations. I think I have here a minute of the associations. The matter attracted so much notice that an official went over from Washington. There is the Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots of New York; there is the American Merchant Marine Association, which includes a few engineers, and is located at Boston; and there is the so-called Neptune Association of New York. The first and third simply expressed their inability to furnish the men.

The men who were the owners of ships said to them: "State a price you ought to have." When that price was stated, they said, "We would like a considerable number of men at that figure"; but they could not get them. You can hardly get them to go on these tugs at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should think not, at fifty or sixty or seventy dollars a month.

Mr. BURTON. Seventy dollars a month was the figure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should not think that would be very attractive.

What I really rose to ask the Senator from Ohio, purely as a matter of information, was this, if I may premise it by a word or two—

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole course of the argument of the Senator from Ohio has been to indicate that what is known as the seaman, the able-bodied or able seaman, is not much of a fellow.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I would not say that.

Mr. CUMMINS. That he is to perform mainly menial work, and that the highest and most important duty relating to these emergencies that sometimes come ought to be performed, and probably can be better performed, by somebody else than the able seaman.

I do not know, but I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, what is the rank of the various employees on a ship? Does a waiter rank higher and get more pay than an able seaman?

Mr. BURTON. I am unable to give the figures in regard to that. I should be more familiar with the trans-Atlantic liners. I should say that the compensation of the stewards, as they are called, would be considerably more than that of the sailors; but it is contingent upon the so-called fees or tips, which are very well established as to amount. The old practice was that at the end of the voyage every occupant of a berth on an ocean steamer must give 10 shillings, or $2.50, to his steward, and that he must give the same amount to the waiter at his table.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not one of the regulations of the law, however?

Mr. BURTON. No; but it is one of the expenses that everybody pays.

Mr. CUMMINS. But excluding that, which I take it is a mere gratuity and is intended generally to secure a service that will not be rendered without a bribe, what is the compensation of a waiter as compared with the compensation of an able seaman?

Mr. BURTON. Really, I am not able to state about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the relative rank or dignity or compensation of an able seaman as compared with a coal passer?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think there is any invidious distinction or comparison between the two. I think the coal passer would have higher wages and shorter hours. It is utterly unsatisfactory to study those figures, because they differ so widely in different parts of the world. I have some figures here, somewhere, on that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if we can not compare them by compensation, how do they rank in what might be called the dignity of the service or the labor?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I think they go to work usually very good-naturedly, without any ideas about dignity or rank or anything of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not mean that. How does the world look upon them in estimating the value and importance of the different kinds of labor which they perform?

Mr. BURTON. The fact is that the sailor is seeking promotion. He is hardly ever satisfied with the position of sailor.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a very happy condition of mind, I am sure.

Mr. BURTON. That is especially true in our own country. The steward is far more permanent on the boat and has a variety of duties to perform which, while some of them are entirely menial, involve a greater degree of familiarity, I should say, with a larger number of subjects. That does not mean that the steward is a better man; but the passengers give him little commissions to perform, and he has the confidence of the passengers who are with him in a way that makes the place an agreeable one—especially agreeable if the passenger gives him a pretty good-sized tip when he is through with the journey.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator from Ohio is unable to say whether the able seaman, if he has had a successful experience of three years, is of more importance to the boat, does a more valuable and higher grade of work on the boat, and is ordinarily a man of higher intelligence than the waiter?

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish to place any estimate on the relative positions of the two. I must say they are both men who are performing an exceedingly valuable service; they are both men who, in time of stress, would very likely prove very efficient, and even heroic.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not wish to disparage either; but we all know that there are ranks in labor, although we respect the men without discrimination. There are some kinds of labor that require more experience and more training and more thought, if you please, than other kinds of labor; and according to the law of the world those men receive a higher compensation. They are usually the men who have the ambition, as just suggested by the Senator from Ohio, to reach up and occupy still more important places in the world. I have always thought the able seamen, as we call them, were of the higher rank, because the work they did and the work they might be called upon to do was more important, more vital to the service in which they were employed, than some other kinds of work in the same service.

Mr. BURTON. You can not very well compare them with any other service. Of course, those who have responsibilities as lookouts or as wheelmen occupy most responsible positions; in fact, the boats could not be navigated without them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Those places are filled not from the ranks of the waiters but from the ranks of the seamen, are they not?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly. The fact that men have that chance for promotion is what draws sailors to the Lakes or to the sea from our country to-day. If it were not for that I think it would be found exceedingly difficult to fill their ranks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that. That is true of a great many fields of human endeavor. If there were not opportunities beyond or above, they would be very difficult to fill. But the Senator from Ohio, as I understand, agreed with the committee which reported the bill; and I find that in the bill there is a recognition of "able seamen."

Mr. BURTON. That is, the grade is created, which I think ought to be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. That must be upon the hypothesis that it is a grade that carries with it some dignity and some capacity. It must be upon the theory that after three years of experience those who are able to survive that experience will be better fitted to meet the perils of the sea than the man with one year, or less than one year, of experience.

I can not quite understand the opposition to this bill, which is based upon the notion that in the long run we will find greater ability among other employees of the ship than among the able seamen. It seems to me we will be more likely to find men of capacity and of courage and of knowledge among the men who have served three years upon the deck than among those in any other part of the crew.

Mr. BURTON. Of course a man selecting a crew would naturally prefer a man who had served three years to one who had served only one year. There must be some degree of superiority, presumably; and if the same man has served three years, he is better than when he had served only one year. But the point is that the duties to be performed are not of a kind that require long training or experience. They are of a very simple nature.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then why has the committee proposed the creation of that rank? If there is really nothing in it, if it is a sort of menial work, such as polishing brasses and scrubbing floors, and that is about the end of it, why should we give it dignity by describing it as the rank or degree of able seaman?

Mr. BURTON. Because, as I have already said, there is a certain presumption that a man who has served three years is better than a man who has served one year. As a second reason, that grade has been established in other countries, and it is a designation which is quite familiar over the world.

Mr. President, I have here a great deal more material that I want to go over. I wish to return for a few moments to a subject from which I departed for a long while, namely, the precautions that should be taken.

I have already considered construction of hulls, fire, and lifeboat equipment. There are a number of other things which should be taken up.

First, in trans-Atlantic travel, there is the matter of ice patrol, in which we have made great progress in the last few years. In the year 1912 two cruisers, the Birmingham and the Salem, were sent out to watch for icebergs. They were equipped with the best of wireless apparatus, and sent the news all around on the Atlantic lanes. In this year, 1913, revenue cutters were sent out to watch for the movement of icebergs, and performed the same duty. It is very desirable that the expense of maintaining this service in the respective zones should be a matter of international agreement. It is too much to ask of any one nation that it pay the bill. On the other hand, it is absolutely necessary that all who take part in the service should thoroughly cooperate, under well-established regulations.

In the same line I might mention derelicts. The figures that are given on this subject in some recent reports are surprising—the number of derelicts that have been abandoned in the track of ships in the Atlantic Ocean. We have also for quite a number of years furnished a vessel for the destruction of derelicts. If a boat is going at a high rate of speed, 20 knots or more, and hits head-on an abandoned vessel, which may be so submerged that the lookout can not see it, there is danger of serious accident.

It is very desirable that modern boats should be equipped with twin screws—some of them are already equipped even with triple screws—so that in case of the failure of one the vessel may, nevertheless, go on its way. There are some boats which have done most excellent service for many years with a single screw. For instance, the Umbria, of the Cunard Line, which was one of the two best boats for some years, being built about 1884, continued in service as a single-screw steamer for nearly, if not quite, 25 years, I think, and performed excellent service without accident. But if there should be a breakdown, such a boat would be left helpless in mid-ocean, and in case of storm would be tossed about very seriously.

Some days ago I made in my remarks a statement with regard to line-carrying projectile guns, and stated that they were required by our own regulations. The object of one of these guns is to throw a line from one boat to another, and then the small line that is cast may pull a larger or stronger line or rope. That class of appliance is especially used in the Life-Saving Service, and it is very desirable that ships at sea should be furnished with it. It appears that the Carmania was furnished with such a gun, and came very close to the Volturno, but, for reasons which have not yet been fully explained, the line-carrying or projectile gun seems to have been ineffective.

There was a great deal of discussion after the Titanic disaster about the utility of searchlights. The question has been very much discussed, and the general opinion is against them, on the ground that they dazzle the eyes; that the lookouts, who otherwise would depend upon their own good eyesight, come to rely on the throwing of illumination by the searchlight, and thereby lose the confidence that they otherwise would possess. However, there are likely to be emergencies in which they would be very useful. In such a case as the Titanic disaster, if there had been a searchlight, and it had been brought into use, there probably would have been no disaster.

While I do not care to put up my opinion against that of experts, it seems to me searchlights should be carried—not for constant use, not for general reliance, for describing objects ahead which should still be left to the lookout, but for those exceptional conditions when it is very dark or when there is a probability that an iceberg or other obstacle is near at hand. That is one of the subjects which certainly should be discussed at the international conference.

It goes without saying that the firing of rockets, except as a signal of distress, should be strictly prohibited.

I notice that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], in his statement yesterday, spoke of Senate bill 136 as having rather insidiously put in a provision for 12 hours' labor. I do not believe he read the bill very carefully. The difference between the Nelson bill and the amendment introduced by him in that regard is that his bill includes under one broad, sweeping provision vessels of more than 100 tons, and says that on such vessels the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two, and the firemen into at least three, watches. As far as the division of labor of the sailors and the firemen is concerned, the provisions are exactly the same in both.

But the bill as it passed last winter, which was the result of long consideration, contained a proviso to the effect that the section should not apply to vessels whose regular schedules between terminal ports did not exceed 24 hours, nor to vessels of less than 300 gross tons. There are a great many of those smaller boats which you can not well bring under the regulations which pertain to a large boat of 1,000, 2,000, 3,000, 4,000, or 5,000 tons. After examining a number of persons, 300 tons seemed to be the more natural dividing line. But bear in mind that it happens that the limit in both bills is the same, 12 hours, and there is a proviso that in vessels under 30 tons, or for a run of less than 24 hours, they may be employed in no case more than 12. This language is added as in all cases:

Provided, That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours, except in cases of emergency, as hereinbefore provided.

The committee, out of abundant caution, put in a further provision that the exemption should in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor. So that in any event, except in the case of a storm, the maximum number of hours is 12; and there is nothing at all that is difficult to understand in this form of the bill as reported by the committee and as passed by the Senate last winter.

The Senator from Wisconsin stated yesterday that travel should be as safe at sea as it is on land. Why, Mr. President, it is a great deal safer. On this subject I have had the figures prepared as to the accidents on railroads and the accidents on the sea. It is a frightful toll in both cases, but the loss of life is far less on the sea.

Take our own merchant marine: In the year 1909 there were on the Great Lakes four passengers drowned or lost. Each one of them, no doubt, had a family and friends; but that is a pretty small number. How many passengers were carried? Fourteen million nine hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and seventy-three. One passenger was lost on the lakes for every 3,739,340.

In 1910 the proportion was somewhat greater. Out of 16,670,000 passengers carried there was a loss of 5, or 1 in every 3,334,000.

In 1911 it was somewhat larger still—13, or 1 in every 1,076,517. But that is explained largely by one disaster which would not be at all affected by this bill. It was the loss of a launch on Lake Ontario, near the city of Kingston, where 7 passengers were drowned at one time. The boat went ashore in a storm. This bill would not have affected it in the least degree. It was a vessel under 100 tons. It was not a naphtha launch, but one propelled by steam. Leaving out that accident, there would have been only 6 lost out of 16,794,000 passengers carried in that year.

Taking the whole country, the proportion of passengers is even less. The number as given by the report of the supervising inspector general for 1909 was only 39 out of 330,000,000 passengers carried; in 1910, 57 out of 325,000,000; in 1911, 71. One in 1909 to 8,485,000 carried. I regret to say that the loss of seamen was larger. On the Lakes there were 82 in 1909 and 340 in the whole country. I am unable to give the proportion, because the total number of seamen employed is not given.

Now, when you turn to the railroads there is a very striking difference. The great distinction, in the first place, is that the losses on the water are usually death losses, and the number of injured is not large in proportion to the number of deaths; but on the railroads the number who are injured in proportion to the number who are killed is very large indeed. Beginning with 1907, which is the first year for which I have the figures, the number of passengers carried on the railroads was 873,000,000; killed, 610; 1 killed to every 1,432,631. In 1909 the number fell to 253, or 1 to every 3,523,606, as against 1 on boats to 8,485,000.

But that is not the worst of it in the comparison. As against 610 killed on railroads in the year 1907, 13,041 were injured, or twenty times as many. So, notwithstanding the excellent management of our railroads and the means that have been taken for raising the standard, the Lakes and the sea still bear the palm as regards safety to human life.

I will, according to the consent I have had given, have these figures published, so that they may be studied more extensively if anyone desires to look at them.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not know but that I may wish to take the floor again. However, for the present there is only one other general point to which I wish to call attention. I regret that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] is not here, as he has inquired about it, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon], who is already quite familiar with the subject. We can not afford to ride roughshod over treaties with foreign countries as we are doing in this substitute bill. Before doing that, to show how hastily the bill has been prepared, I want to call attention to a few points in particulars other than those relating to foreign relations. In the first place, if anyone will look at the amendment proposed as a substitute for S. 136, there is no congruity whatever between the part ending with the word "and" in line 7, as I have it here, and that which follows.

Mr. NORRIS. On what page?

Mr. BURTON. On page 2. The first section pertains to the making up of the crew in case of desertion or casualty, while the second governs the hours of seamen and their employment. It says that—

In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections.

It goes on to deal with an entirely different subject, which should be in an entirely different section. But there is more than that. This first portion as it is here in the proposed substitute repeals the Hardy Act, as it was called, the manning bill, which was approved on the 3d of March last. The fact is, I may say to those who favor the bill, the existing law is more stringent in its provisions than this which it is proposed to insert. It would be well in any event to examine the existing law on the subject. I do not really think this first portion has any particular use in this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My attention was diverted for a minute. May I inquire if the Senator is speaking of the first section of the bill?

Mr. BURTON. The very beginning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The section that proposes to reenact section 4516?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You were referring to the first portion. What portion did you mean, if I may inquire?

Mr. BURTON. That portion down to line 4 on the second page. I do not mean the print that has the varied type, but down to line 4, the words "without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did I understand the Senator to say that as to that first portion it repeals the Hardy Act?

Mr. BURTON. It would very materially modify it; and another thing—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just wait one moment, if the Senator please. What change do the lines which the Senator read make in the existing law?

Mr. BURTON. A very trivial change. The word "refill" is used in the old statute and the word "fill" is used here; and in the prior line I think the words "must be of the same or higher grade" are "must be of a grade the same or higher." There are some immaterial differences like that. The portion as introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin and as introduced in the House in the last Congress and as reported to the Senate makes practically no change in the existing law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Down to line 4 on page 2 the Senator does not contend, then, that the change made in this section is material?

Mr. BURTON. It is not a material change in the existing law as it was before the Hardy Act of last winter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, as it is now?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; as it is now a very material change is made. The Hardy Act—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the change that is made, if the Senator will just call attention to it?

Mr. BURTON. I will read the Hardy Act, if the Senator will follow me:

If any such vessel is deprived of the services of any number of the crew without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any person interested in the vessel, the vessel may proceed on her voyage if, in the judgment of the master, she is sufficiently manned for such voyage: Provided, That the master shall ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same grade or of a higher rating with those whose places they fill. If the master shall fail to explain in writing the cause of such deficiency in the crew to the local inspectors within 12 hours of the time of the arrival of the vessel at her destination, he shall be liable to a penalty of $50. If the vessel shall not be manned as provided in this act, the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $100, or, in case of an insufficient number of licensed officers, to a penalty of $500.

It is much more severe than you have it here.

Another thing: I am inclined to think that as you have it here it refers only to vessels engaged in foreign trade, while the Hardy Act is general. This, as you can see here, refers only to vessels in the foreign trade. It provides that the master shall "report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive." That evidently means not the domestic trade, but the foreign trade.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The provision is exactly as it is reported to the Senate from the committee of which the Senator is a member.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I think so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is exactly in the same form in which it was reported—that is, so much of the section as the Senator has quoted is in exactly the same form in which he reported it.

Mr. BURTON. Last winter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At the close of the last Congress.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and this act was passed after the bill was reported.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do I understand that the Senator dissented from the report of the committee when the bill was reported at this session?

Mr. BURTON. I did not wish any report at all to be made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did the Senator file any dissenting views on the subject?

Mr. BURTON. No; I did not. I regarded it as an incongruous thing to do to file a report and say that nothing ought to be done about it before the next session, and await an international conference. I did not regard it as the best course. So I opposed the reporting of this bill and bringing it upon the calendar.

There is no reason why any antagonism should be aroused by my making the suggestion. First, I am perfectly willing to admit there is another thing that was omitted in the bill which I reported last winter. It is in regard to the question of quarters. The bill was taken as nearly as possible from the bill which had been reported in and passed by the House. In section 5, on page 5, amending the act of March 3, 1897, all reference to existing vessels is stricken out in the law. It was 72 cubic feet quarters for each seaman and was made 100 cubic feet for boats built after a certain time. This bill, omitting the portion which refers to existing vessels, states that the whole section shall be repealed, and then begins with a proviso relating to vessels thereafter built. If the statute were passed in this form we would be in the very peculiar position that no provision whatever would be made for quarters on existing ships. I may say in this connection that, according to the testimony last winter, every vessel owner seemed perfectly willing to comply with the provisions here in regard to the size of the quarters and in regard to the quantity of food.

Mr. President, there is one provision in the bill that I do not believe there will be a dissenting voice about in its relation to foreign nations. It is the abolition of arrest for desertion. It has been maintained that the arrest-for-desertion statute was passed in the early nineties of the century before the last; that a fugitive-slave law was passed at about the same time; and that they are very similar in their phraseology. If nothing else were done except doing away with arrest for desertion, it would have been worth while to bring in this bill, though in the bill which passed the Senate and which the committee reported much more was done, as I showed this morning, in ameliorating the condition of the seamen and all on board a boat and in providing for greater safety of human life. But we framed the sections in regard to arrest for desertion cautiously and diplomatically, recognizing the existence of treaties.

This bill is ingenious from the standpoint of the seamen. I am not going to blame them for it. It has three propositions: First, a man may desert without arrest; second, at any port into which he goes, on giving 48 hours' notice, he may have half his pay; third, no allotment shall be given out from his wages.

That makes it possible for the sailor to leave his employment whenever he chooses, and whether his contract is finished or not, whether the time for payment has accrued or not, he may receive half his wages.

I do not object to that kind of a provision as it relates to American seamen, but it is in direct contravention of international law and our treaties with foreign countries, and it has provoked vigorous protest from them. They say, "you have no business to go on our ships and say, as you do here in this statute, that the courts of the United States shall be open to them." This proviso is as follows:

Provided further, That this section—

That is the one relating to the payment of half wages after 48 hours of demand therefor. There was very little opposition to that from any person who appeared before the committee, but there is this proviso:

Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement.

That is a direct violation of treaties without any notice whatever that we intend or desire to terminate them.

Now, let us see, first, what is the general international law on that subject. It is stated in the Wildenhus case, One hundred and twentieth United States, 11, after stating the general law, that when the boat of one country comes into the port of another it subjects itself to the law of the place to which it goes, unless by treaty or otherwise the two countries have come to some different understanding. Chief Justice Waite says:

From experience, however, it was found long ago that it would be beneficial to commerce if the local government would abstain from interfering with the internal discipline of the ship and the general regulations of the rights and duties of the officers and crew toward the vessel or among themselves. And so by comity it came to be generally understood among civilized nations that all matters of discipline and all things done on board which affected only the vessel or those belonging to her, and did not involve the peace or dignity of the country or the tranquillity of the port—should be left by the local government to be dealt with by the authorities of the nation to which the vessel belonged, as the laws of that nation or the interests of its commerce should require.

That is the distinction—

The learned justice then goes on to say:

But if crimes are committed on board of a character to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country to which the vessel has been brought, the offenders have never by comity or usage been entitled to any exemption from the operation of the local laws for their punishment, if the local tribunals see fit to assert their authority. Such being the general public law on this subject, treaties and conventions have been entered into by nations having commercial intercourse, the purpose of which was to settle and define the rights and duties of the contracting parties with respect to each other in these particulars, and thus prevent the inconvenience that might arise from attempts to exercise conflicting jurisdictions.

So we see what the general international law is on the subject, and the suggestion that treaties and conventions have been framed in many instances in pursuance of it.

Now, let us turn for illustration to our treaty with the German Empire of 1871, where it will be noticed in article 13 this case is covered broadly and in the clearest language:

Consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall have the exclusive power to take cognizance of and to determine differences of every kind which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captains, officers, and crews, and specially in reference to wages and the execution of mutual contracts. Neither any court or authority shall, on any pretext, interfere in these differences, except in cases where the differences on board ship are of a nature to disturb the peace and public order in port, or on shore, or when persons other than the officers and crew of the vessel are parties to the disturbance.

Whatever may be the merits of this proposition, we are attempting to repeal and annul that treaty without saying a word about it. It abrogates a treaty in a way that is an insult. While I am not going just now to oppose that provision for giving control to our courts in regard to vessels of foreign countries, it is well for us to recollect that two can work along that line. If we violate the international rule, how do we know what some other country may do? If we pass a statute that is contrary to the law of Germany and the custom in vogue there and provide that one-half of the wages must be paid a German seaman in an American port, although he is engaged for a trip from Hamburg or Bremen to New York and return and is to receive his wages when he returns, what is to hinder them from passing a law that any naturalized German who has not performed military service in the German Army can be taken off one of our boats and subjected to the performance of that service?

What is to prevent them from imposing any regulation on our shipping in their ports which is onerous or even disastrous to it? I think we had better hesitate a good while before we adopt such a provision as that, especially without giving the year's notice that is prescribed by treaty.

Again, section 12 is full of provisions such as the number of able seamen who are to be on board. Their law makes no provision as to the number of able seamen who are to be on board. It makes no provision that lifeboat men shall be men who have served three years as able seamen. But this statute, without reference to the abrogation of any treaty, without seeking to annul conventions under which they have control of their internal arrangements, says to them, "You must put on 40 per cent of able seamen the first year, 45 the next year, and so on, until you have 65 per cent, and all your lifeboats must be manned by at least two able seamen," thereby going on their boats, which are as it were their soil, and prescribing regulations.

Of course, if there were no treaties, we might absolutely exclude the boats of any nation from our ports, and as a result, it is maintained, you can impose any kind of a regulation or condition upon them. But here is a case where there are treaties that govern these relations, and it is proposed in this amendment to do away with the control of these nations over their ships and to enforce a rule as to the payment of wages, which is in direct contravention of our own agreements with them.

I have not had so long experience here as some others, but I have noticed that when treaty provisions are involved we usually act with a certain degree of care, and I think we should so act. Whatever anyone's opinion may be about the desirability of introducing this class of regulations and making it binding on foreign nations as well as our own, there is a right and a wrong way to do it, and this bill proposes to go at it in the wrong way, without making any mention of treaties, without calling on the President to enter into negotiations to abrogate treaties, without calling on him to give any notice, as is provided in the treaty itself, but to go right ahead in the language which I believe was once uttered in the Senate—"What have we to do with abroad?"

Mr. President, we can not afford to take that kind of an attitude. That is one reason why I deprecate action on this bill at this time. I deprecate action also—and I can not repeat it too often—after giving an invitation, as we did, for an international conference upon the matters involved in this bill. There is hardly a thing here except matter of pure domestic regulation but what we have asked other countries of the world to confer with us about—the manning of boats, the efficiency of crews, lifeboat apparatus—all that runs through this bill here, prevention of fire, regulation against collisions at sea. All those we asked the other maritime countries to meet and confer with us about.

Our invitation was accepted. Indeed, all of them were so impressed with the desirability of such a meeting that while our invitation was the first it is difficult to tell exactly upon whose invitation the conference is to be held. They, and we as well, have formulated propositions for consideration. It is open for those who meet to consider almost any subject pertaining to navigation. The conference has been called for the 12th of November—just 22 days from to-day. Our President chose delegates, our State Department has notified those Governments that we have chosen the delegates and that we are to take part, and now you propose here to pledge the Senate of the United States, before which any treaty would be brought, to certain propositions. What would those other nations naturally have to say? "Why, you asked us to come together with you to consider with a full and a free mind certain regulations in regard to the great marine of the world, regulations relating to safety and to relations between all the nations; but you, in the face of your invitation, disregarding your own action and flouting us, have passed a set of regulations and of rules that affect our shipping and all the subjects to be considered in the most serious way." Is that quite the attitude that we can afford to take about this, my fellow Senators?

Suppose at another time we invite a conference on something else, and our invitation goes forth. Will not the very natural inquiry come back, "What is this? Does this mean anything? The last time you invited us to meet and confer you went right ahead and sought to settle in your Senate the very questions that you had asked us to meet and confer about." Patriotism does not lie in showing animosity or lack of diplomacy or respect to other nations.

I am perfectly willing on the floor of the Senate to stand for the utmost good faith toward every nation on the globe. I despise the cowardice of some persons who, when they want to win popularity, attack some foreign monarch or potentate or some foreign country, thinking they will make capital by it, because there is no "comeback" about it. It has become a very common thing in this country for somebody to appeal to the people on the ground that he is very courageous because he has something to say about the Sultan of Jolo or the Sultan of Turkey, or some monarch somewhere in the world who can never injure him. It is about time we should be a little more careful, I think, in our diplomatic relations. I think we have gone to the very verge in some things that we have already done.

While I am for America in everything, I am not ready to accept in its entirety the sentiment of Commodore Decatur. I can say: "My country; may she be always right." But I can not accept the last clause of what he said: "But my country, right or wrong."

Mr. FLETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I simply desire to say that there have been some adjustments of time or some arrangement by which I was to follow after the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]; but I very gladly, upon the request of the Senator from Florida, yield my position to him as the chairman of the subcommittee at this time, so that he may speak on this important bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Illinois for allowing me to proceed now, because, unless I do so, I fear I shall not be able to do so at all, having been stricken with quite an acute attack of la grippe last Friday, which has not yet left me. I am a little discouraged in the hope that it is going to leave me very soon, but I shall detain the Senate only a short time. I feel that having served the committee which took the testimony of witnesses in regard to the pending bill—or, rather, the bill that was before it at that time, which finally took the form of this bill—perhaps it is my duty to submit some observations upon the subject.

Mr. President, the committee for several months sat and heard witnesses from all parts of the country—from the Pacific coast, from the Great Lakes, and from the Atlantic coast; people who are engaged in operating vessels of considerable magnitude, people who are employed, and people who employ officers and seamen. We finally reached the conclusion that the differences which appeared from time to time as to the details of the bill could scarcely be adjusted between the parties by agreement among themselves, and we despaired of satisfying completely the various interests. The result was that we endeavored to frame a bill which would serve the public, serve the interests of the seamen, and the interests of the shipowners as well, so far as that could possibly be done.

The bill which the committee reported to the Senate, which was amended in the Senate afterwards and finally passed, is identical with Senate bill 136. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has explained, that bill failed by reason of the lack of the President's approval. But the bill as it originally came from the other House was reintroduced at this session as Senate bill No. 4. Another bill was introduced by the Senator from Ohio. Those three bills were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and by that committee referred to a subcommittee, composed, I believe, of the same Senators as composed the former subcommittee. The subcommittee reported back to the full committee Senate bill 136. Finally the Commerce Committee authorized the report of Senate bill 136 as its best judgment in the premises. Although there were different views upon details each member was left at liberty to favor such amendments to Senate bill 136 as might, in his judgment, improve it upon its final consideration.

Senate bill 136 is not a bill framed in the interest of the shipowners; it is not a bill framed in the interest of the seamen; it is a bill framed primarily in the interest of the great public, as we understood it, and a bill which at the same time endeavored to do no injury to any great industry or enterprise; no harm to the shipowners particularly; no injury certainly to the seamen. Its purpose was to accomplish what we set out to accomplish and what there was need of accomplishing.

The three main purposes were: First, to give freedom to seamen and improve their condition; second, to promote safety of life at sea; third, to equalize the wage cost of operating vessels, foreign and domestic, taking cargoes or passengers from ports of the United States. It is very generally acknowledged that the bill will accomplish those three purposes. In my judgment Senate bill 136 will accomplish those three purposes.

The proposed amendment, it is claimed, will improve Senate bill 136 and relieve all doubt or question as to accomplishing these three great purposes. I will allude a little later on to some features in that connection which incline me to favor some provisions of the proposed substitute. Then there are some features in the proposed substitute that rather leave me believing that Senate bill 136 is the better, the safer, and the wiser measure.

First, Senate bill 136 permits seamen on foreign vessels to leave their vessels in ports of the United States; that was one great thing to be worked out; second, it permits seamen to draw one-half of the pay due them in any port where the vessel lies or delivers cargo, making this section applicable to foreign vessels while they are within the jurisdiction of our laws; and third, it provides a specific standard in a limited number of the deck crew as to skill and the knowledge of the language spoken by the officers, and makes this applicable to foreign vessels while in ports of the United States; in other words, it recognizes that skill is necessary to safety at sea, and that it is just as necessary for vessels under foreign flags as for domestic vessels. It therefore provides that the crew shall be of the same qualifications and shall be hired under the same conditions in ports of the United States. I question very much if the proposed amendment will go much further in that direction or secure those principles more completely than does Senate bill 136. In some respects it may, and in so far as it does I approve of the proposed substitute.

It is intended to change existing laws which the development of shipping has made antiquated or obsolete; it is intended to bring maritime laws up to date, to have such laws keep pace with the progress of water transportation.

The efforts of the committee were directed toward serving the best interests of the public, the seamen, and the shipowners as well, as I have stated. The public interest, we believe, lies in the direction of encouraging, advancing, and building up our mercantile marine. If we can make seafaring life more inviting, it would be worth while. If we can say to American youth, "Here is open to you an occupation reasonably remunerative, in which just and humane treatment will be accorded you; decent and healthy accommodations will be furnished; necessary supplies will be wholesome and adequate; your rights as men will be respected," we will be doing the proper thing and rendering a service to the public. It would seem we could not too strongly or firmly take a stand in favor of those things. If it be contended that the men who go to sea already in large part enjoy those things, then no one can complain that we provide for them in the law; if it be contended that such a law would work a hardship on those who employ the men, I submit that the employer should find a way to be relieved of such hardship other than by taking it out on the men. I do not believe it will be seriously asserted that sympathy for such a position can justly be invoked.

Another feature wherein the public is concerned is the provision for efficiency in the crew, particularly in the case of trouble at sea.

Still another provision of public concern is that with reference to the rating of the men, insuring skill in the handling of lifeboats. Section 12 of the proposed substitute corresponds to sections 14 and 15 of Senate bill 136. I think, if the friends of the proposed substitute will be entirely frank, they will admit that the provisions in section 12 of the proposed substitute requiring that 75 per cent of the crew in each department shall understand the orders of the officer is not so much intended to promote safety at sea as it is to affect wages and to secure the employment of other than Asiatic seamen on the Pacific.

As to safety by reason of knowing the language of the officers, I am not so much impressed with the provisions in Senate bill 136 as I am with the provisions of the proposed substitute. In the proposed substitute 75 per cent of the crew in each department are required to understand "the orders of the officers"; in Senate bill 136, 75 per cent of the crew are required to understand the orders of the officer, and a certain portion of the crew must be able to understand the precise language of the officer giving the command, unless there are sufficient interpreters among the crew who can interpret the language of the command to those speaking another tongue. The emphasis on understanding the language seems to me not so material or important as some seem inclined to think. The fact is, as we know, that our railway trains are operated by signals and signs, and not by orders or commands. Recently I witnessed a cavalry drill where 2,000 men were engaged, and not an audible command was given throughout all the maneuvers. Everything was done by signals and signs, and even the horses seemed to understand them. I believe it was the famous Hannibal who gave all his commands by signs; and it seems to me that a commanding officer on a vessel can very well communicate to the crew and to the men who are to do things in emergencies or otherwise what he desires to be done without it being necessary that the men who are to do the things should understand the language employed by the officer in command; in other words, those commands may be given in large part by signals, by signs, by movements, and perhaps by bells and whistles and that sort of thing; so that it is not so important that the crew should understand the language of the officer giving the command as some seem to think.

It would be an advantage, doubtless, in cases of disaster to have every member of the crew understand the orders of the officers. We may well concede, too, that we would feel much safer in taking a lifeboat handled by men who had three years' experience at sea than one handled by men who had one year's experience or less.

There is much in the contention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that skill in handling a lifeboat does not necessarily result from service at sea. That skill may be possessed by men who have served a much less time at sea than three years, and yet it seems to me that it would be well to fix some sort of standard whereby the people who are transported on the immense vessels of to-day may be in the hands, in case of disaster, of seamen who are not novices and who are to some extent at least skilled in their work. That standard is fixed by the substitute, which requires three years' service at sea to constitute an able seaman, and provides that there shall be at least two able seamen to each lifeboat.

As to the shipowners, if those requirements should lessen the profits of the shipowners I would greatly prefer to have them charge more for the service they render than to dispense with the requirements. The cost of labor on a vessel is but a small percentage of the total fixed charges of the vessel. If wages should be increased, it would mean but a small addition, relatively, to the operating expenses, and under the circumstances better material would be had and the increase of efficiency would more than offset the increase of wages.

As to the seamen, the talk of slavery is rather far-fetched. We have abolished in our coasting trade arrest or imprisonment for breach of contract. We have the legal right to say to the world that no man shall be liable to arrest and to be restrained of his liberty in our ports because he sees fit to break a contract, onerous or otherwise. At the same time the shipping business is sui generis. We must recognize that it is different from any other business, and it is absolutely necessary that there should be discipline on board the ship, and to some extent this includes the shore.

The public is interested at this point also. The commander of a vessel, big or little, must have absolute authority. The vessel, the people, and the property on board can not be safe without such vested power. Every member of the crew must recognize the lawful authority of the officer in command. It would never do to lose sight of that principle. In enlarging the rights and liberties of the seamen as now recognized there must be no approach to the destruction of proper discipline on board the vessel in port, at sea, in emergencies, or under any circumstances when the relations of the master and the sailor have become established and navigation undertaken.

The right to one-half the earned wages at a stopping place on a voyage would seem to be reasonable. It would not induce a sailor to leave a ship when he was being decently treated and fairly compensated to have the privilege of quitting and collecting only one-half of what he had earned. On the other hand, if the sailor is maltreated, or for sufficient reason he quits the vessel, perhaps in a strange land, he should at least have half the wages he has earned in cash. The forfeiture of the other half would seem to be ample allowance by way of liquidated damages for breach of his contract.

It was strongly urged before the committee that the effect of the provision of section 12 of the proposed substitute would greatly injure Seattle especially and send shipping to our neighbor on the north. It may be well to bear in mind that there are only five American ships regularly in the trans-Pacific trade—the steamers Mongolia, Korea, Manchuria, Siberia, and China, operated by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. There is no subsidy, no Government aid, or anything of that sort conceded to them. They compete with three oriental steamship company ships, subsidized by the Japanese Government as follows: One for $1,340,000 gold per year, another for $605,000 gold per year, and the third for $238,000 gold per year. They also compete with the Canadian Steamship Co., subsidized by the British and Canadian Governments at $218,000 gold per year.

Under all the circumstances the committee thought that section 12 of Senate bill 4 should be modified as it has been by sections 14 and 15 of Senate bill 136, and consequently the committee reported the bill in that form. I am inclined to apprehend that section 12 of Senate bill 4 is rather drastic and ill-advised in some respects. At the same time I believe sections 14 and 15 of Senate bill 136 as written scarcely come up to the requirements of the situation, particularly as bearing on the standard of efficiency. Take the Volturmo. Yesterday the Washington Times contained this dispatch:

NEW YORK, October 21, 1913.

Cabling from Rotterdam, Capt. Smiltneck said the Volturmo's distress signals were reported to him at noon on October 9 and that he reached the burning ship at midnight. He said:

"I found the Carmantia standing by the burning ship with a moderate northwest gale blowing. The Czar launched the first lifeboat in command of the chief officer. It returned immediately with 15 survivors. The third mate proceeded with further rescuing, saving in all 102 survivors. The second lifeboat made five trips in all to the burning vessel."

Why, at the very outset, should four out of the six lifeboats of the Volturmo have been lost in launching? Surely they were not rotten boats. If not, can we escape the conclusion that they were not properly handled and not properly manned?

Undoubtedly the wireless service in that great catastrophe was most excellent. This was sadly lacking in the Titanic disaster. As has been stated to-day in the discussion, the wireless service was splendid in the case of the Volturmo. A wonderful advance has been made in that science. The remarkable genius of man has been able to discover a means of communicating through the air and reaching on the darkest night in mid-ocean other vessels within a radius of 200, 300, or 400 miles.

Mr. Marconi testified on the stand during the Titanic investigation that he had been able to transmit wireless messages 8,000 miles, from a point in Ireland to Buenos Aires. I asked him the question, "How long did it take that message to go that distance?" and he said, "Precisely like lightning; just like snapping your fingers." I think Italy has done a most commendable thing in recognizing her gifted son who has made such a vast contribution to humanity and to civilization by making him, as the King recently did, a Senator for life. It is a matter of genuine gratification to us that the Congress of the United States, after the irreparable loss of the Titanic, passed a law dealing minutely with radio communication or wireless telegraphy at sea, requiring operators sufficient in number and training to give continuous competent service, and requiring vessels to be well equipped with both apparatus and operators. We passed a law, also, providing a manning scale for officers and regulating their hours of labor. This bill or a bill similar to this—in fact, this identical bill, Senate bill 136—to provide for a skilled crew and for improved conditions of the men was passed, but did not become a law, as has been heretofore mentioned. Congress has been giving quite energetic attention to maritime matters, and I have observed no disposition to prevent or obstruct legislation on these subjects.

In the case of the Volturmo vessels fairly swarmed about the burning ship in time to rescue the passengers and crew. There was no need of what some people claimed when we were investigating the Titanic disaster, that possibly the only remedy or means of averting these terrible catastrophes would be to have these great passenger carriers go in pairs across the ocean, one following the other, so that if anything happened to one the other would be close at hand and could give relief. That remedy is now unnecessary, rendered so by the use of wireless telegraphy, the Marconi system.

Now we come to the more numerous, though but little less important, equipment of the vessel—the men under the officers. I am in favor of doing the fair and just thing by them, not only for their sake—though that would be enough reason—but because the public and the owners of the vessels themselves ought to have it done. I would build up our merchant marine; and it seems to me that while good ships are needed, they would be wholly insufficient to that end unless they could have capable and efficient men to operate them. Cheap, picked-up derelicts, without spirit or ambition, with the hope only of keeping body and soul together, lounging about wharves and dives, are not dependable seamen; they certainly do not harmonize with the magnificence and the luxury of modern passenger-carrying ships. They are not in accord with the furnishings and equipment of such vessels. There are needed on board such ships, and there ought to be available, help of a standard corresponding to the importance of the enterprise.

Likewise, the freighters ought to be able to obtain, and should have, trustworthy, reliable, capable men, who would find in the employment suitable reward. The answer is: Raise the standard of efficiency; provide for such hours of work, such terms of compensation, such conditions of service as will attract material of the right kind. Give the American boy a chance at the business of the sea.

I would much prefer an increase in freight and passenger rates on the water, if that would necessarily follow the change, to existing laws and conditions. However, my information is that the steamship companies are making splendid profits, large dividends, and are exceedingly prosperous. These ocean carrier companies seem to go to any limit in pursuing the goddess of luxury and in yielding to the demon of speed. Let them give a little more consideration to the human beings they must employ, without whom their ships would rot at the docks. This human help, to be of the fit sort, must have the right kind of treatment. To broaden the field from which it can be gathered there must be some inducement held out—not a hopeless, helpless future. There must be a fair remuneration and a living environment, not merely sustenance combined with hardship.

This riffraff, these derelicts that are picked up and used and put into positions of responsibility on these vessels, also set the rate of wages; they fix the standard of wages; and consequently, again, that system is most demoralizing, and to be deprecated.

I speak, then, for the men whose labors and skill are employed on the ships, as well as for the public who use the ships; and in doing that I speak also, I believe, for those who build, own, and operate the ships. I speak for a merchant marine of dignity, capacity, and strength commensurate with the position of the greatest commercial Nation of the world. England may take first place in the naval world; Germany may take first place in the military world; but America takes first place in the commercial world. As peace lasts longer than war, the latter is the most important place to take; and it means that a nation in such a position can dictate both in peace and in war, using only the weapon of trade, and will not likely need any other.

Mr. President, I have recited the three main purposes of the pending bill. I believe the bill will accomplish the purposes desired. The proposed substitute may better do that. In some respects it removes some limitations and qualifications contained in the bill as reported; but they are not tremendously important, it seems to me. Some of these affect shipping on the Great Lakes. I think it fair to say that the evidence before the committee was to the effect that there was less ground of complaint by seamen on the Great Lakes than in either coast or foreign shipping. The fact that conditions on the Lakes are now so satisfactory would be scarcely sufficient argument against providing for the future, however.

Section 18 of the proposed substitute, the concluding section, I believe to be unnecessary, and in fact confusing. Section 15 covers the repeal of section 5280 of the Revised Statutes so far as desired, and it seems to me the matter had better be left there.

From the provisions of section 12 as to the number of lifeboats it seems to me an exception should be made as to shipping on rivers and in harbors. There is no need of stacking on a steamer going down a river, for instance, more lifeboats than she could conveniently take care of, or loading down the upper deck with lifeboats, when perhaps she is generally only a few hundred feet from shore. I think, therefore, that exception ought to be made.

The provision in the substitute for at least two men of the rating of able seaman I do not like as well as the provision on that subject in Senate bill 136. However, I am not disposed to quarrel with the substitute in that regard.

I may say, in conclusion, that much of the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is unanswerable. His splendid and able discussion of the subject warrants the most serious consideration, and he thoroughly understands it. At the same time, why should we now begin to reason about whether or not we should act upon this bill at this time? Granted that its passage would have the effect of repealing in the manner the treaties provide for treaties with foreign nations; granted that an international conference is soon to be held in London on the great subject of safety at sea, and that at this conference the United States will be fully represented; granted that the conference results from our own invitation; granted that Germany, France, the Netherlands, Spain, England, and other maritime powers have signified their preference that we should delay action upon this bill until that conference shall have reached a conclusion, we have already decided to take up this matter now. We have decided to dispose of it, and it is useless to argue the question as to whether or not a vote ought to be postponed. Therefore I shall take no time in considering that matter.

The subject is not a new one. We are dealing with a question we have dealt with before. We actually passed this bill—Senate bill 136—through the Senate of the United States; the action of the Senate was concurred in by the House, and the bill would have become a law if it had received the signature of the President. That is the proposition now before the Senate, so that it is not new.

It seems to me we should not be in any wise showing a lack of consideration to other Governments if the Senate should take a stand which would signify its views on these rather pressing questions. The bill involves to some extent some of the matters with which the international conference will deal. I admit that it does. The international conference, I believe, will take up this question of the number of lifeboats, and the equipment of lifeboats, and will take up other questions, such as the qualifications of the men; but there are matters involved here which will not be considered by the conference. The most important features of the bill are matters which are not to be taken up by the conference.

It seems to me that under all the conditions, in view of the present situation regarding the seaman and regarding the interest of the merchant marine of our country, and the need of promoting safety to human life, we ought not longer to delay action on this important measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has charge of the bill, and I desire his presence. He said he would return at once. It is his intention to have a vote to-night, if possible, and I think other Senators would like to dispose of the matter. For that reason I would rather not occupy the floor if a vote can be had. I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate. I do not think it is necessary since the very able utterance and exposition of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I was about to add that I believe the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] desires to make some further observations on another phase of the matter.

Mr. BURTON. I have a considerable amount of material on which I should like to speak. I should prefer to proceed to-morrow, but if there is insistence I suppose I can go ahead to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is within a few minutes of 5 o'clock, I see, and the Senator from Ohio says he would prefer to speak to-morrow. I do not think there will be more than one or two other speeches to be made upon the subject, and the voting will not begin until 4 o'clock. I suggest that we might go into executive session for a few minutes, and then adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. If the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is in accord with the wishes of those who are in charge of the bill, I will move an executive session; but I will not do so unless they so desire.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Wisconsin is on his way, and I should like to have a moment of delay if it does not inconvenience anybody. I suggest that the matter rest until he gets here. He will be here in a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see why. The Senator from Wisconsin has spoken, has he not?

Mr. KERN. But he may have something else to say. He will be here in a moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will have some proposition to make looking to an amendment to his proposed substitute somewhat in line with what I have referred to. If so, he perhaps ought to do so before a vote is taken on his substitute. I know he has an impression that it would be well to modify some of the provisions of the proposed substitute. If he does that, I think it ought to be done before the substitute is voted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nothing is to be voted on before 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. The unanimous-consent agreement, as I understand, provides that a vote is to be taken not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but my suggestion was that we should adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Then the Senator from Wisconsin could be here, of course, and could offer the amendments to his substitute, and the Senator from Ohio could finish his address.

Mr. FLETCHER. So far as I am concerned, that is agreeable to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that anybody else wants to speak, unless the Senator from Wisconsin wants to make a sur-rejoinder. Then the voting would begin at 4 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator from Ohio tell us about how much time he will likely want?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think more than an hour; perhaps an hour. If there should be questions, it might be a longer time than that.

Mr. LEWIS. I will ask the Senator from Ohio, if I may be permitted, whether it is his intention to have his observations concluded in the Committee of the Whole, or to wait until the bill is in the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer that they be concluded in Committee of the Whole.

At this point Mr. LA FOLLETTE entered the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, some reference was made to what might be the desire of the Senator from Wisconsin as to whether or not it is to conclude the consideration of the bill to-night. I wish to state very frankly to the Senator the reason for my inquiry.

I regard this as an extremely important bill. It is one that affects our relations with every maritime nation, and very seriously affects our treaty obligations. Of course we can abrogate them. I do not mean that they are insurmountable. I think, however, that in the case of a bill of this importance, with its far-reaching consequences, when a notice has been given which is tantamount to saying that a vote will be taken at 4 o'clock to-morrow, it would hardly be advisable to take it with a very small attendance of Senators this afternoon. I myself should prefer that the bill should go over until to-morrow for that reason.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, of course I am very desirous of meeting the personal wishes of Senators; but I think that by the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement Senators had as much right to expect that the vote would occur before 4 o'clock to-morrow as they had to expect that it would occur at that time. The unanimous-consent agreement in terms says that the vote upon the passage of the bill and all pending amendments shall be taken not later than 4 o'clock on Thursday, the 23d day of October.

I desire to be perfectly frank with the Senate. I realize that there is a disposition to prevent the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. BACON. The Senator certainly does not address that remark to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not, and I do not think the Senator had any right to assume that it had a personal application to him.

Mr. BACON. Only the right that the Senator was replying directly to my suggestion without doing me the honor to state to whom he referred.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Georgia has not heretofore taken any part in the debate on the bill. I did not have the Senator from Georgia in mind at all.

If the Senate is to be put to the test of furnishing a quorum to pass this bill, I think it quite important that we should understand it as early as possible, so that we may have as much time as can be provided to secure a quorum. It is for that reason, and that reason only, that I should be disposed to press the Senate to consider the proposed substitute in Committee of the Whole to-night and to vote upon it. I should be very glad to get that stage of the parliamentary proceedings behind us if we could. Of course, under the rules of the Senate we have an opportunity to offer amendments and to debate the whole proposition after the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator propose to go only as far as voting in Committee of the Whole to-night?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would depend somewhat upon the attitude on that question of the opposition to legislation at this time. If there should be no demand for a quorum at this hour in moving out of the Committee of the Whole and into the Senate and to one stage nearer the passage of the bill, I think that ought to be weighed somewhat in considering what it is best to do.

I believe the passage of this bill at this time is the most important work in which the Senate of the United States will engage at this extra session of Congress. Probably not all Senators will agree with me in that. Other legislation deals with business interests. This legislation deals with the liberty of 130,000 American citizens and with the safety of life of all the people of our country and of other countries who cross the ocean in so far as they are to be affected by it. I can not conceive of anything more important than addressing ourselves seriously to the perfection of this legislation and to advancing it as rapidly as possible toward a place on the statute books.

Just one word further on the subject of the way in which the bill affects our relations with foreign governments. Provision is made here for the President to give notice to foreign powers. There is not in the provisions of the substitute—and I ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this part of my remarks—anything like so harsh an interference, if it be termed an interference, with foreign vessels as in the bill which was reported from the committee and in the bill which was reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in the last Congress.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator has done me the honor to ask for my special attention to that remark, I wish to say very frankly that it would take me much longer than to-morrow to make the investigation of this bill which I should like to have the opportunity to make and which I should feel under obligations to make if I were on the committee or had been especially active in connection with the proposed legislation. I have not, however; and I am not making that remark with a view of any suggestion for its postponement beyond the time when it was anticipated that we would be called upon to vote upon it. I did think I would have to-night and to-morrow for the purpose of looking through the bill to see whether or not there were any amendments which I thought it important to offer, solely upon the one feature which was suggested in the remark I made before.

Neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor any other Senator on this floor is more impressed than I am with the importance of measures which shall increase the safety of ocean travel or shall further safeguard the lives of those who go upon the great deep. I have had frequent opportunity to see the necessity for such measures personally, in addition to such information as we all have about things which none of us have personally seen but of which we know. Nor does the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator go further than I do, in addition to the desire for these safeguards of human life, in the desire for all those things which will ameliorate and better the conditions of sailors who have to spend their lives in this hazardous, dangerous occupation, and who, when in that occupation, are so completely removed from the guardianship and care which the law ordinarily throws around people in their avocations upon land, and who in that occupation are to such great degree subjected to the arbitrary and unlimited authority of those who then have them in command. I fully appreciate all that. I am fully alive to the necessity of it and fully anxious to do all we can properly do in this matter.

But, Mr. President, it is an extremely serious thing when we undertake to legislate as to conditions which are not directly under our jurisdiction but which relate particularly to the jurisdiction of other countries over their own affairs, over their own ships, and over their own nationals, as they may be called in diplomatic language, people of their nationality, subjects and citizens of other nations. I say it is a very serious thing when we undertake to take care not only of our own but when we undertake to say that which according to the general law of nations is left to the people themselves who have the authority and the responsibility. That is a general principle of international law.

Not only so, Mr. President, but when we ourselves have gone further and in solemn treaty stipulations provided that we will do so, I say it is a most serious proposition. I confess I am not in a position to discuss it, and I do not expect to discuss it, because I would not undertake to discuss a matter so serious as this without a degree of preparation which I have not had the opportunity now to make. But I do think it is important that we should look carefully through this proposed legislation, and without sacrificing any of the great purposes which are influencing those who are active in it, and whose motives and purposes must be applauded, and which I do applaud, I want to see whether or not, without sacrificing those, we can keep ourselves in the limits of what has heretofore been recognized as a rule of international law and within the limit of our solemn treaty obligations.

Mr. President, we have enough of present and anticipated friction now with foreign nations upon several questions. If we can adopt legislation here which will advance and promote the great purposes which are in view and at the same time not further increase the probability of friction between this Nation and other nations, I think it is important that we should do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The proposition of this bill is not in any wise to restrict the liberty of any foreign citizen. The proposition is here that a foreign citizen or a national—a citizen of any country—coming to our shores shall be a free man, and our courts shall not be open to deprive him of his liberty. I do not presume that foreign governments could blame us for that.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize that that is only one of a great many propositions in the bill. If that were the only one, the bill might stand without the slightest objection, but there are a great many other provisions which do conflict with our treaty stipulations.

Mr. President, in view of our great responsibility and in view of our great interests which are involved in our relations with other nations, I submit to the Senate whether it is not of the utmost importance that the most careful scrutiny should be had as to each of these propositions.

Mr. President, I applaud the generous heart of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which always responds to every appeal that is made in the interest of humanity and the uplift of those who are not capable of taking care of themselves. We all know that that is one of the principal characteristics of the honorable Senator. There has never been a controversy in the Senate or a measure proposed in the Senate where that issue was involved that the Senator from Wisconsin was not always found, not only by his vote but his voice, most manfully contending for those who needed protection and who were not able to take care of themselves. I applaud him in this instance, because we know the purpose which he has. I sympathize with him most fully. But, Mr. President, it is a matter of extreme solemnity, it is a matter of great importance, it is one involving great consequences when in these three volumes of treaties with other nations, as we have them, and throughout those treaties with every important nation in the world there are provisions which this bill antagonizes and in a degree overrides.

Mr. President, recognizing to the fullest the high purpose of those who desire this legislation, sympathizing with it to the fullest, desiring the accomplishment to the fullest that can be done with safety, ought we not to pause when such a momentous proposition is presented to us as that which this bill does present?

I may be trespassing too far upon the time of the Senator. I do not know whether he has the floor or I. We were both upon it. I recognize his courtesy, of course, if he has the floor.

I know, Mr. President, that there is scarcely any question which could be presented for the consideration of the Senate in the discussion of which there could be involved a greater amount of true, genuine, unaffected sentiment and sympathy, and in which the great interest of human life could be presented so directly and so fully as in the propositions which are before us in this bill and the purposes which are at the bottom of everything that is in the bill. There can be nothing to appeal to human sentiment and human sympathy greater than that which affects human life unless it be that other thing which is involved in the bill, which the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] suggests, and that is human liberty. Here we have a bill which must command the sympathy of every man who listens and who is called upon to act because it affects human life and affects human liberty. The fact that it does appeal to every generous heart is a fact which should make us the more cautious that in yielding to that which thus appeals so strongly we may not do something else which may be a great evil.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that with my other occupations I would want several weeks to consider this bill, and if I had no other occupation I would want several days to study the bill to see the effect which it will have upon our relations with foreign countries, and I do not think they are to be disregarded. The world has gotten spaller. We have gotten closer to foreign nations. We are in more direct and intimate communication with them every day. The issues affecting our relations are more vital than they were in former days when the world was larger, when it took a month to cross the ocean, and when it took that long to get a message across the ocean.

I know, Mr. President, that something has been said about the fact that we have entered into an agreement with foreign nations to have a conference on this subject in a convention which meets in London next month, a conference which is so important that it is a little matter of pride between the United States and Great Britain as to which one it was that extended the invitation. Each of them claim to have extended the invitation. While I recognize that that might lay upon us an obligation not to attempt to anticipate it, still I do not regard that as a vital argument or one which imposes an insuperable barrier to our proceedings, because, in the first place, I do not suppose it is anticipated that this bill can become a law, if it should pass the Senate, before that conference meets. It would simply be the action of the Senate and would indicate the views of the Senate, and if those views were subsequently not in exact harmony with the action of the conference in London, whether it were a bill simply which had passed the Senate or whether it were a bill which had passed the other House and received the sanction of the President, there would be ample opportunity for us, if we saw proper, to conform our legislation to the suggestions of that conference. So I do not think that is an insuperable obstacle, although I rather think it is but proper deference that we should await its action. So it is not with that view, Mr. President, that I am troubled.

Mr. President, it is a serious thing to abrogate a treaty with another nation. It is a serious thing after we have entered into a solemn treaty obligation with another nation to set that aside without consultation or notice to the other nation. It is bad enough with men in their private, personal relations, entering into contractual or other obligations that are mutual, for one man to set up and without notice to the other one or conferring with him arbitrarily tear up a paper and throw it away. But it is an infinitely more serious matter when nations representing great peoples have entered into treaty obligations, some of which have lasted nearly a hundred years, and which have in them no stipulation that a certain notice shall be given before abrogated because no anticipation is had that there will be an abrogation—it is a most solemn thing, I say, without notice to one of those nations or without asking them to confer about it or to agree with us about it, to exercise the power which we undoubtedly have by legislative act to destroy that treaty.

Mr. President, it has got to be a very extreme case before I will do it. I have voted for the abrogation of but one treaty by statutory enactment, and that was the case of the Russian treaty, and there had been for a long time negotiations between this Government and the Russian Government over the points at issue, on account of which we did abrogate it. But in this instance we have not called on a nation to meet with us and confer as to the questions whether or not we will destroy these treaties. There is not a single one of them to whom we have done the courtesy to say that we propose to abrogate a treaty.

Mr. President, I venture the assertion that there is not a Senator on this floor who will stand in his place to-day and say how many nations there are with whom we have treaties which will be abrogated by this bill if it is passed and specify what nations they are. If a Senator will stand in his place and admit that he has made the investigation and does know, I will most cordially withdraw the suggestion. Is there a Senator here who can stand in his place in the Senate and state how many treaties there are that this Government has with foreign nations with which this proposed bill will conflict and treaties which, if this bill is passed, will be abrogated? If there is no Senator here who can do that, are we proceeding with the care, with the caution, with the deliberation which should characterize us when we deal with such a solemn subject and with such far-reaching responsibility?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator is in possession of the information, I am interested to know the number of treaties that would be affected by the bill.

Mr. BACON. I am very frank to say to the Senator from Connecticut that I am not in possession of it. I did propose to ascertain, if I had the opportunity until to-morrow, possibly. I have the book here which I intended to look through. I did not anticipate this matter would come up this afternoon; but I will say very frankly to the Senator that, without having made the investigation, I am of the opinion that it will affect our treaty with every important maritime nation of the earth.

Mr. STONE. In what way?

Mr. BACON. By directly doing what the treaties say we shall not do. That is a reply to a sotto voce inquiry from the Senator from Missouri as to what way. I will give the Senator one illustration. I confess I have not examined this bill in detail, because I knew it had been before the Committee on Commerce, a committee composed of as able Senators as are to be found in this Chamber, and I supposed, of course, that all these matters had been carefully examined into. Doubtless they have been; but the committee have not reached the conclusion which I had anticipated that they would as to some matters. If some Senator will ask me how, I will give him one illustration. I will give him one that I find in looking at the bill on the surface. It is a principle of international law, recognized as a principle of international law, not only recognized generally as a principle of international law but recognized and laid down in the decisions of our Supreme Court, that as to everything in regard to the internal affairs of a foreign ship, excepting only those things which concern our peace and good order in our own harbors; as to all else foreign nations are to make the laws which shall govern and regulate those affairs in those ships.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course I hesitate to take issue with the Senator from Georgia on that statement, but I hold in my hand One hundred and ninetyeth Supreme Court Reports, Patterson against Bark Eudora, from which, with the permission of the Senator, I will read.

Mr. BACON. I am familiar with the decision in that case, and I think when the Senator reads it it will be found that I am correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will read just a portion of a paragraph:

It is part of the law of civilized nations that when a merchant vessel of one country enters the ports of another for the purposes of trade it subjects itself to the law of the place to which it goes, unless by treaty or otherwise the two countries have come to some different understanding or agreement.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is to be taken into account, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is to be taken into account, of course, but excepting that a foreign vessel in an American port—

Mr. BACON. Is the Senator reading now?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I am not. I am stating what I conceive to be the principle which controls a foreign vessel within an American port and subject to the laws of our own country.

Mr. President, it is a curious thing in this debate that the point is made against the provision in the proposed substitute which seeks only to control conditions upon a foreign vessel at the hour when that vessel departs from an American port, and that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who makes that criticism of the proposed substitute, himself reported a bill at the last Congress which provided regulations for foreign vessels, not only as they should leave our ports, but assumed to control the internal management of those vessels at sea after they had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I want to turn to the provisions of the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me. I am not entering into a general discussion of this bill; I am answering the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I had not cited the illustration in full, and I am not professing to discuss all the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I shall defer what I have to say in criticism of the point which is raised by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BACON. I have disclaimed having such familiarity with the subject as would justify my attempting to discuss it at large. I do not, however, wish to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin if he prefers to go on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had just as soon make my statement at another time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there are a great many things in this bill of which I approve. I repeat, the purpose of it I most heartily approve, to wit, the double purpose of safeguarding the lives of people at sea and also, so far as possible, ameliorating and improving the condition of sailors. When the Senator comes to deal with our own ships I will go, I presume, as far as he will in the support of measures which will protect the sailors on our ships and ameliorate and improve their condition. I was responding to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, and I stated as a proposition of international law—and I am not fearful as to the correctness of that statement—that nations whose subjects or citizens have ships are to legislate as to all matters concerning the management and control of those ships and have jurisdiction as to all things in regard to those ships when in our own ports, except so far as concerns peace and security and safety. A man can not, for instance, commit a crime upon a foreign ship and escape responsibility to local law nor can he perpetrate a nuisance and escape responsibility to local laws, but as to other matters they have jurisdiction. I have forgotten the volume in which the case is reported and I am not sure whether the particular case which I had in mind was the case the Senator was going to read, but if so it goes on to state the proposition which I did have in mind and which I am endeavoring to state. There is no trouble about producing the authority, though I think it is One hundred and twentieth United States Reports.

Mr. LEWIS. There is a case in One hundred and nineteenth United States, the court discussing that legal phase, which is possibly the case the Senator from Georgia has in mind.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I think the case the Senator from Georgia refers to is the Wildenhuis case, reported in One hundred and twentieth United States Reports, at page 1.

Mr. BACON. No. 120 is the number of the volume, if I recollect correctly, in which the proposition is stated by our Supreme Court; but, Mr. President, that is but preliminary to what I was going to say.

We have a right to pass a law which is in conflict with international law if we see fit to do so. International law has but one tribunal for its enforcement, and that is the tribunal of arms. Whenever a nation sees proper to enact legislation which is in conflict with international law it has the right to do so, and if it has the power to maintain it it can make it good. There is no question about that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. There is a feature in this bill that has given me a little disturbance, to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia at this time, so that I may have his very able legal opinion. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton], for whose legal opinion I likewise express great admiration and deference, asserted, if I did not misunderstand him, that the provision in this bill that gave to the Federal courts jurisdiction of differences arising between the seamen and the captain and the owner was itself in conflict with our treaties, wherein it was provided that the consuls of the different countries should have jurisdiction of the disputes between the seamen and the master. I ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia does he assume that a provision of law that gave to the Federal courts jurisdiction of a transaction involving commerce in our own ports would be a violation of the treaty between this country and another that had merely provided that a consul should have jurisdiction of a similar dispute?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to go into that question to illustrate the attitude which I am taking here to-day. I am not pretending to discuss the features of this bill, and I again say that I am trying to reply to an inquiry made of me by the Senator from Missouri, which I have not yet done, and which I shall be very glad to do if I have the opportunity to finish.

I wish to say to the learned Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] that the question which he propounds is one that I would want to look into very closely. That may not be one, but there are instances in which, under international law and under the decisions of our Supreme Court, foreign nations would have the right to legislate and have their legislation made effective as to what should occur, what should be done, and what should not be done, upon a ship which this bill when passed will abrogate and destroy.

I was going on to say that not every provision in it by any means—and the provision suggested by the learned Senator from Illinois may be one which does not fall within that category—but there are those provisions which do fall within it, and not only those which fall within the natural obligations of international law, but, what is more particularly important, fall within the distinct contractual obligations of this Government with others in treaty stipulations. Those are the ones that I particularly have trouble about, for, I repeat, we have the right to pass a law which shall be in conflict with a general principle of international law if we see fit to do so, and we do not have to call the attention of the balance of the world to it when we do it; but when we pass a law which shall abrogate the provisions of a treaty solemnly entered into it is another matter.

Then, I say, Mr. President, before we do it we ought to call the attention of the nation with which we have such treaty stipulations and ask her to confer with us to see whether or not we can agree upon a change. I say it is not in accord with custom, and not in accord with good policy, to say nothing as to what might be required by proper deference and proper respect; it is not in accord with custom or good policy when we have a treaty with another nation, more particularly when we have treaties with a dozen nations or more, to pass an act of Congress which shall abrogate that treaty without having invited the attention of the other nation to it and asked that nation to agree to change the treaty. That is what this bill does.

I said, Mr. President, that there were treaty obligations. I will read one of them. I am not sure but that under the favored-nation clause, even if no similar provision is found in any treaty with any other maritime nation, every other nation has the right to the same benefit. Article 13 of the treaty of 1871 between the United States and Germany, made immediately after the formation of the present German Empire, is in this language:

Consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall have the exclusive power to take cognizance of and to determine differences of every kind which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captains, officers, and crews, and specially in reference to wages and the execution of mutual contracts. Neither any court or authority shall, on any pretext, interfere in these differences, except in cases where the differences on board ship are of a nature to disturb the peace and public order in port.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is that to which I wish to invite the distinguished Senator's attention. I contend—

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator not permit me to read the provision through?

Mr. LEWIS. From the pleasant manner in which the Senator had come to a period and rested for breath I thought he had concluded.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the learned Senator for his complimentary remark as to my manner, which is not always calculated to evoke commendation of that kind. I think the Senator is overpolite. Mr. President, I will finish the reading:

Neither any court or authority shall, on any pretext, interfere in these differences except in cases where the differences on board ship are of a nature to disturb the peace and public order in port or on shore, or when persons other than the officers and crew of the vessel are parties to the disturbance.

Except as aforesaid, the local authorities shall confine themselves to the rendering of efficient aid to the consuls, when they may ask it, in order to arrest and hold all persons, whose names are borne on the ship's articles, and whom they may deem it necessary to detain. Those persons shall be arrested at the sole request of the consuls, addressed in writing to the local authorities and supported by an official extract from the register of the ship or the list of the crew, and shall be held during the whole time of their stay in the port at the disposal of the consuls. Their release shall be granted only at the request of the consuls, made in writing.

Now, Mr. President, that may be something that we should abrogate. I am not standing here for the purpose of defending that.

Mr. LEWIS. What I wish to ask the Senator—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I must state my position before I am utterly unboresed by the argument of the Senator from Illinois, which I anticipate with reasonable probability.

Mr. LEWIS. This is not a quadruped undertaking, I assure the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BACON. I do, if the Senator desires.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I only wanted to get the Senator's point of view.

Mr. BACON. What I want to say, Mr. President, is this: That may be an altogether improper stipulation; that may be a stipulation which does injustice to ourselves; that may be a stipulation which does injustice to the crews of foreign vessels. I am not here for the purpose of defending it; that is not what I am on my feet to say; but what I am here to say is that we have agreed to it solemnly and for over 40 years it has been the supreme law of this land; for over 40 years it has been our agreement with the Empire of Germany, or, rather, with the German Empire—there is no such thing as the Empire of Germany—for over 40 years that has been our agreement with the German Empire. I have not had the time to examine the matter to see whether there are similar stipulations in our treaties with other great maritime nations, but if there are not, as I have said before, I am not prepared now to say that under the favored-nation clause all the other nations with whom we have treaties containing such a clause may not have the benefit of the stipulation referred to. I do not wish to undertake to say, without further investigation, that that is so.

I repeat, I did not read that for the purpose of saying what it ought to be; I simply read it for the purpose of showing that it is what it is. That is our agreement. It may be that it ought to be changed; but, if so, Mr. President, comity between nations, proper regard for our treaty obligations, and proper regard for our friendly relations with the Government with which we have made a stipulation of that kind requires that, when we propose to change it, we should ask that nation to agree with us upon the change—not ask it with the idea that if she does not agree we are still to be bound by it if we do not agree with her about it, but ask it in the hope that there may be such modification as we think ought to be made; ask it, if you please, with a purpose to disregard it and to legislate as we see proper if there should be such disagreement.

The point I make, Mr. President, is that it is not consistent with usage, it is not consistent with good policy, when we have a treaty obligation with a foreign nation, one of the great friendly nations with which we have great commercial intercourse, with which we have very much in common, with which we wish to maintain and continue friendly relations—I say it is not consistent, Mr. President, with usage or with good policy for us to pass a law which would abrogate it, which this bill will do, without showing proper deference to the country with which we have heretofore solemnly made that agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume the Senator means—and I ask for my own information if he does mean—that even where a convention contains in terms the provision that it may be abrogated in whole or in part upon the giving of a certain number of days' notice by either party, even in that case the diplomatic usage is that there should be an attempt to modify it by agreement before notice of abrogation is given?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly; whether there is a stipulation for notice or no stipulation for notice, the usage among nations in this modern day, to say nothing of the past, when possibly they took advantage of each other without as much regard for the amenities of life as is now prevalent, is when a nation has a treaty with another nation which it is desired to change to invite that nation to a conference with a view to agreement upon a change, and to take drastic action in changing it over the wish of the other nation only after such opportunity for mutual agreement.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator from Georgia has misapprehended the object of my interrogation. At no time was it to take issue with him as to whether or not the provision is wise, or whether or not our abrogating a treaty by this measure of legislation, if such we are doing, is expedient. It was this:

I stated the confusion in my own mind caused by the assertion made from so reliable a source as the Senator from Ohio, and now again from the Senator from Georgia. Since the treaty of 1871 discloses a condition of premise such as I have heretofore explained, that we did have a treaty which provided that disputes between the seaman and the master or owner respecting wages, and similar conflicts, should be disposed of by the consul, and since it is now contended by the Senator from Ohio, and apparently by the Senator from Georgia, that the provisions of this bill would conflict with it, I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia whether, in his judgment, as a matter of law, the Government of Germany has not regarded that provision as obsolete, in view of the fact that we have since then frequently enacted laws which allow a lien upon that same vessel in any port to be foreclosed in the Federal courts for the recovery of those very same wages?

Mr. BACON. All that may be true, but it does not at all conflict with the proposition I make. It may be true that it does amount to a modification, and to that extent an invasion of the treaty. I am not prepared to say, though, whether that was ever done without having had a conference with the German Government as to whether they would be willing for it to be done.

Every Senator here knows, however, that we have had no conference with the German Government, or with any other Government having a like provision, as to whether or not they would consent to its change. Every Senator here knows that we are not proposing to take this drastic action, because we have been unable to agree with a foreign Government. Every Senator here knows that we are proceeding in utter disregard of the fact that we have entered into this solemn stipulation, and that we are proposing, in disregard of usage and in disregard of good policy, to abrogate solemn treaties without a word to the nations with which we have made them.

Mr. President, when I rose I had no idea of discussing this question this afternoon. I have no doubt there are a great many other things in this very far-reaching bill which require careful consideration. I very much wish this matter had been called to the attention of the Senate in a way to challenge our attention and to impress upon us the importance of careful investigation.

Matters which concern our own internal policy we can proceed with as hastily as we please, though we ought to give careful consideration to everything; but it is a matter of supreme importance, when we propose legislation which is to affect our relations with other countries, that we shall proceed in a way which will satisfy us and satisfy the world that we have given careful consideration to that which we propose to do; that we have weighed the consequences, and that we have observed the amenities which are thought properly to control in international intercourse.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is granted, I take it, that the legislation here proposed is within the power and jurisdiction of Congress. I have been very much impressed with the very forcible statement of the Senator from Georgia that we must do nothing that will create friction or disaffection between ourselves and other countries. We have an agreement with Germany concerning this subject. We do not want any agreement with Germany in the future with regard to it if Congress is in favor of the provisions of this bill. In other words, we want to legislate upon it ourselves and to adopt our own rule with regard to it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me right there to see if I understand him correctly? Does the Senator mean that we would prefer to enact this legislation as our own individual separate act, abrogating the feature I have read of a treaty existing between this country and Germany, rather than have Germany consent to the changes that are to be made?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say anything about abrogating the treaty. I did say that the theory and policy of this bill is that we intend to impose this rule without regard to the consent of any other nation. Practically speaking, of course, that means without any effort to secure another agreement, because the Senator from Georgia very well knows that in all human probability we could not secure an agreement in the terms of our bill with every country in the world which desires to enter our ports for commercial purposes.

Mr. BACON. I do not think the assumption is justified that we can not agree with other nations about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The treaties are not the same now, and I assume that any effort to make a uniform agreement with all the countries of the world, if not entirely unavailing, would very greatly prolong the settlement of the matter. But assume, now, that Congress desires to establish this policy; Congress can not give notice to Germany; Congress can not take up the matter of negotiation with Germany.

Mr. BACON. Congress can very easily adopt a method by which it can be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the President of the United States were not in harmony with the policy here proposed? Suppose he were satisfied with the treaties as they now are?

Mr. BACON. Why does the Senator suppose that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Simply because it is within the range of human probability; that is all.

Mr. BACON. I doubt it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not assuming that the President of the United States at this moment is not in harmony with it, but I am trying to examine our power as well as the propriety of our action.

In the first place, we have the constitutional authority to legislate upon the subject. In the second place, we have no way—indeed, no legislative branch of a government has any way—of dealing diplomatically, in a contractual way, with any other country in the world. We desire now to establish this policy. We can not direct the President of the United States to enter into a negotiation with Germany for a change of our treaties. We can, of course, request the President of the United States to do it. It still lies with him to enter upon the negotiation or to refuse to do so.

What have we done here? I notice, of course, the passage at arms over on the other side of the Chamber; but nevertheless—

Mr. BACON. I simply made a side remark.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I believe the spirit in which I am speaking is a national spirit and an American spirit.

Mr. BACON. Certainly nothing I have said or done would indicate the contrary. Nobody has questioned the Senator's patriotism or his national feeling or his generous impulses or his logical acumen.

Mr. CUMMINS. I drew my own conclusions from what happened. In this bill we have not been unmindful of our relations with Germany or with any other country. We have recognized that these treaties are in existence. We have provided that these provisions, in so far as they conflict with any treaty, promises, or agreements, shall not take effect for a period of one year. We have asked the President of the United States to give the notice that is required to terminate in an orderly and respectful way such provisions or agreements as are in conflict with the legislation. There is nothing here, it seems to me, at which any foreign nation can take umbrage. We are simply exercising our undoubted power, establishing a policy that we have a right to establish, and asking that these agreements which may lie in the way shall be disposed of in the manner provided in the agreements themselves. What is there here to create friction?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator, if he rose to ask me a question, that he give it to me. It is hardly fair to inject this speech in the middle of my remarks.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I accept that criticism, Mr. President. We all do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator desires to ask me a question, I shall be glad to have him do so, and give me an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not yet reached the question.

Mr. BACON. Then I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Iowa will yield to me—

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no right to yield to the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa, the part of this bill providing for notice of abrogation refers only to provisions relating to desertion.

Mr. BACON. I must insist that I be allowed to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURTON. The language is:

That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion—

And so forth.

Mr. BACON. I wish the Senator from Ohio would pardon me. I was nearly through; I lacked but a minute of being through when the Senator from Iowa desired to ask me a question, for which he has laid the foundation with some degree of care, and I simply desire to have it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was laying the foundation for this question: I have called attention to the fact that we are exercising a power given to us by the Constitution; that we have a right to establish this policy—

Mr. BACON. Nobody controverts that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that the treaty-making power is not with Congress. Part of it may be with the Senate, but it is not with Congress. Therefore when we provide in the very measure which is in conflict with the treaty that the President of the United States shall take up the subject with the foreign country and shall, in accordance with the terms of the agreement itself, bring the conflicting provisions to an end, does the Senator from Georgia think such a course could by any possibility give just offense to any country on the face of the earth?

Mr. BACON. Is that the Senator's question?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think it would give such offense as would be recognized as a casus belli, to use the Latin I learned when I was a schoolboy; but I have no doubt whatever that it would give umbrage and would be considered a proceeding not in accord with the courteous usage and procedure usually characteristic of the intercourse between nations.

Mr. President, the Senator's whole proposition is simply this: In response to the suggestion that notice ought to be given, he assumes, in the first place, that if such notice were given the foreign Government—the German Government in the particular case in question here now—would not agree with us, and therefore we should not stop to negotiate with it. I think that is an assumption which is not justified. I think it is an assumption, even if the Senator has great confidence in it, to act upon which would be in utter disregard of the usual methods of international intercourse.

The next suggestion of the learned Senator is that we can not communicate with Germany or with any other foreign nation. When it is pointed out that we have the simple method of communicating with foreign Governments through the President of the United States, the reply of the Senator is another assumption—that the President of the United States might not be in harmony with our view and might not make the communication.

It seems to me it is hardly worth while to answer suggestions of that kind further than to state the propositions themselves.

I was about to conclude, and I had before me the book I had in mind when I said to the Senator from Wisconsin that I was familiar with the case. I thought he was going to read from One hundred and twentieth United States, with which I am familiar, in which a proposition is laid down from which I will now read a paragraph to the Senate. It is in what is known as Wildenhuss's case. I read, from page 12 of volume 120 of the United States Supreme Court Reports, an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Waite:

From experience, however, it was found long ago that it would be beneficial to commerce if the local government would abstain from interfering with the internal discipline of the ship and the general regulation of the rights and duties of the officers and crew toward the vessel or among themselves. And so by comity it came to be generally understood among civilized nations that all matters of discipline and all things done on board which affected only the vessel or those belonging to her and did not involve the peace or dignity of the country or the tranquillity of the port should be left by the local government to be dealt with by the authorities of the nation to which the vessel belonged as the laws of that nation or the interests of its commerce should require. But if crimes are committed on board of a character to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country to which the vessel has been brought, the offenders have never by comity or usage been entitled to any exemption from the operation of the local laws for their punishment, if the local tribunals see fit to assert their authority. Such being the general public law on this subject, treaties and conventions have been entered into by nations having commercial intercourse the purpose of which was to settle and define the rights and duties of the contracting parties with respect to each other in these particulars, and thus prevent the inconvenience that might arise from attempts to exercise conflicting jurisdictions.

And so forth.

That, Mr. President, states the general proposition, and that is what is found in the treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator give me the reference to that case?

Mr. BACON. Yes; One hundred and twentieth United States, page 12.

Mr. President, I do not know that I will have another word to say on this subject, and I do not myself propose to call the roll for the purpose of embarrassing the question of the passage of the bill. I have done my part. For myself I can not vote for it; and in saying I can not vote for it I repeat that the Senator from Wisconsin does not go further than I do in the desire to safeguard human life at sea and to make all proper and legitimate provision which can be made to that end. The Senator from Wisconsin does not go further than I do in the desire to ameliorate and improve the condition of sailors.

But I can not shut my eyes, Mr. President, to the fact that this proposed legislation is not in harmony with our general policy in proposing thus arbitrarily and drastically to set aside the provisions of treaties by a legislative enactment without ever having entered into conference with the other nations with which we have made such treaties.

I repeat, Mr. President, I thought it was my duty as a Senator to say this much. I do not suppose this is to be the end of this legislation. It has to be considered elsewhere. With this statement I am perfectly content to leave it. I have no doubt there are very many provisions in the bill which it is extremely desirable to have enacted. There are many of which I would approve, but I do disapprove and can not give my support to measures which propose by legislation to abrogate a treaty solemnly made without an invitation to the nation with which we have made such a treaty to confer with us as to the changes. It will be time enough when we have conferred with them to make the changes if we think they ought to be made.

The reply to that is that while we wait human life is in danger. Then I say confine the bill to those provisions. Confine the bill to the provisions which do not conflict with our treaties and the Senator will have no dissent as to its enactment.

Mr. President, I repeat, as I said before, but I want to say it in this connection, when it comes to the question of legislating as to our own shipping and our own seamen, I will go as far as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in joining with him as to legislation affecting them. If after we have done it, as we have done it in the past and as nations usually do, after we have attempted to agree with foreign nations as to changes in treaties which we have already made with them, I am not prepared to say if they will not agree with us that I may not still go with the Senator in the measure which he proposes; but I am not willing by legislative action to abrogate, not only one treaty, but a dozen treaties with every prominent maritime nation of the earth, arbitrarily abrogating provisions as to which we have heretofore given our solemn consent without saying one word to those nations before we undertake so to do.

I repeat, I do not know that I shall say another word; it is not my purpose to avail myself of any opportunity which may be presented to defeat the bill in any way, but I do think that the views which I have expressed should at least receive the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that a good deal of this discussion is somewhat a tempest in a teapot. I do not understand that the bill undertakes to abrogate a solemn treaty by a legislative enactment. I understand that the bill undertakes to do the only thing that the legislative branch of the Government can do in connection with the abrogation of a treaty, when the legislative branch is engaged in the business of passing legislation which conflicts with existing treaties, and that is to provide that if there be a conflict between the legislation and the existing treaty the President is requested to give notice of abrogation in the terms of the treaty, whatever it may be.

I understand that if that is not clear enough it will be made clear enough by an amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. Undoubtedly it ought to go a little further, and it ought to provide that any provision of the bill in conflict with any provision of any treaty shall not go into effect until the termination of the period of the notice of abrogation to be given by the Executive. But I did not rise chiefly for that purpose. I rose chiefly for the purpose of disputing—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator pardon an interruption just at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When I first offered Senate bill No. 4 it did not contain the last three sections regarding treaties which are now in the substitute as I have offered it. It did contain a provision that was broad in its terms with respect to notice and covered every possible case. But the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who reported the bill from the Committee on Commerce, in addressing the Senate laid special stress upon the attention which the committee had given to the treatment of the foreign treaties in the last three sections of the committee bill. He said repeatedly in his first address upon the bill that he thought everybody conceded that those sections of the bill S. 136 as reported made a better disposition of the treaty matter than did the substitute as I had proposed it; and, without giving that careful reading to it which I have since done, convinced that as the committee reported it, the report being joined in by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has attacked that provision now, that it was not quite as broad as it was in the form in which I had originally introduced it, I took the last three sections of the bill as reported from the committee of which the Senator from Ohio is a member without any dissent from him, dealing with the treaties, and attached it to my bill in place of the section which I had on that subject, and I offered it as a substitute. In looking it over and having had my attention called to it by the Senator from Mississippi, I find that in order to cover all treaties it was limited, as the committee reported it, just to desertion treaties which the provisions of this bill concerning desertions might affect. I will offer at the proper time an amendment broadening it so as to provide that the President shall extend the notice to all countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, furthermore, time ought to be given so that it shall not go into effect until after the period of notice of abrogation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I am necessitated to leave the Chamber, and I did not wish in a debate in which I have taken part to absent myself without making the statement that I am compelled to go.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not at all necessary for the Senator to listen to what I am about to say.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of the Senator's speech in particular; I am speaking of all. I would stay if there were going to be a roll call, but I know there will be none. If there were one, I should certainly vote against the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course the Senator knows he does not owe any apology to the Senate for leaving the Chamber, as the Senator is one of the most constant attendants in the Chamber I have known, and he would not leave unless he had good reasons; and the Senate would not expect him to make any excuse at all.

Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of saying that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is totally mistaken in his apprehension of the Wildenhuis case, and he is totally mistaken in his laying down of the general principle of international law, because the general principle is precisely the contrary. The general principle of international law, in the absence of a treaty or of a convention, is that every ship in the harbor of a nation is subject in every respect to the laws of that nation, and it is only when a treaty stipulation to the contrary exists that international law puts a different color upon it. In that case the coloring of the law comes not from a general principle of international law, but from the specific expression of the treaty or convention.

The Wildenhuis case was decided upon the express language of a treaty with Belgium. That is not all. I say that even the treaties do not go as far as the Senator from Georgia seems to think. They go only to the discipline of the ship and the internal affairs of the ship; that is all. We have a treaty with France, I believe, in which the treaty goes a bit further. It says that all matters of wages concerning the party on the ship shall be sent to the consular court for its decision.

In order to establish what I have said about the general principles of international law it is well enough to let the Senate understand this case. It is the case of Wildenhuis, who was a sailor upon a Belgian ship. He had a quarrel with another sailor by the name of Fijens, and during the quarrel he killed Fijens. He was arrested by the New Jersey authorities upon the charge of felonious homicide. The Belgian consul came into court and contended that under the treaty with the United States that matter ought to be cognizable by the Belgian consular court or by the Belgian authority. Of course the consul would not have tried the man; he would have sent him home to be tried, on the ground that the affray occurred upon the ship. Now, mark it, not only on the ground that it occurred upon the ship, but it occurred below decks upon the ship. Yet the court decided that, notwithstanding the treaty and notwithstanding the fact that homicide occurred upon the ship and below deck upon the ship, the plea of the Belgian consul was not well founded and the man must be tried by the New Jersey authorities upon the charge of felonious homicide. That case went to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court affirmed it; and that is this case.

Now, let us see upon what ground the Supreme Court affirmed it.

The plea was:

That the said affray occurred and ended wholly below the deck of the said steamship and that the tranquillity of the said port of Jersey City was in no wise disturbed or endangered thereby.

The claim of the consul was that by the law of nations and the provisions of the treaty the offense with which Wildenhuis was charged is "solely cognizable by the authority of the laws of the Kingdom of Belgium," and that the State of New Jersey was without jurisdiction in the premises. The circuit court refused to deliver the prisoners to the consul and remanded them to the custody of the jailer. (28 Fed. Rep., 924.) To reverse that decision this appeal was taken.

Now, what is the language of the court? Chief Justice Waite, as the distinguished Senator from Georgia said, announced it. Here it is. Now, mark the general principle of law and then mark its exception. He said:

It is part of the law of civilized nations that when a merchant vessel of one country enters the ports of another for the purposes of trade it subjects itself to the law of the place to which it goes—

That language is quoted in the case that was read by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] a moment ago, and is reaffirmed—unless by treaty—

Now, mark you—

unless by treaty or otherwise the two countries have come to some different understanding or agreement, for, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall in The Exchange, 7 Cranch, 116, 144, "it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society and would subject the laws to continual infraction and the Government to degradation if such * * * merchants"—

That means merchant vessels; it is used in the technical sense—

"did not owe temporary and local allegiance and were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country."

Now follows the exception:

From experience, however, it was found long ago that it would be beneficial to commerce if the local government would abstain from interfering—

With what?—

with the internal discipline of the ship—

What else?—

and the general regulation of the rights and duties of the officers and crew toward the vessel or among themselves.

Now, mark it—

And so by comity it came to be generally understood among civilized nations that all matters of discipline and all things done on board—

Not something off board at all; they never had gone that far; and in this case, which is the very case at bar, a thing done on board was held to be an exception. What sort of thing was done on board then? Mark you—and all things done on board which affected only the vessel or those belonging to her, and did not involve the peace or dignity of the country or the tranquillity of the port should be left by the local government to be dealt with by the authorities of the nation to which the vessel belonged as the laws of that nation or the interests of its commerce should require.

Now, then, further—

Such being—

He uses this principle again. He says:

Such being the general public law on this subject, treaties and conventions have been entered into by nations having commercial intercourse, the purpose of which was to settle and define the rights and duties of the contracting parties with respect to each other in these particulars, and thus prevent the inconvenience that might arise from attempts to exercise conflicting jurisdictions.

What was the treaty with Belgium? Here is the language of it:

The consuls or vice consuls—

That is, of each national in the ports of the other—shall exercise police over all—

Mark the language—"police over." Every lawyer understands what "police" means—over all the vessels of their respective nations—

That is, the police power upon board—and shall have on board the said vessels all power and jurisdiction in civil matters in all the disputes which may there arise—

In civil matters—

they shall have an entire inspection over the said vessels—

"Inspection over." It can not be exercised out of the vessel—over the said vessels, their crew, and the changes and substitutions there to be made, for which purpose they may go on board the said vessels whenever they may judge it necessary.

Without a treaty a consul has no right to go upon the vessel of his own country if you do not want him to. Then follows this language:

Well understood—

That is a sort of French law phrase, evidently translated literally from the French by somebody. It is a sort of equivalent to our "provided, however" law phrase.

Well understood that the functions hereby allowed shall be confined to the interior of the vessels, and that they shall not take place in any case which shall have any interference with the police of the ports where the said vessels shall be.

Here is something about the case of the Sally and the Newton, which was decided, I believe, by Chief Justice Marshall pretty much upon the same general principle as this, but I will not refer to it now.

The treaty with France goes a little further, and undoubtedly this provision saying that the sailors shall be paid a certain proportion of their wages in port does violate not the general principle of international law at all but the specific provision of this treaty. It says:

The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captain, officers, and crew, without exception—particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts.

This is the broadest of all of them, and here it adds:

Undoubtedly, then, that provision of this bill which gives us the right to make a foreign vessel in an American port pay one-half of the wages due might be an infringement of this provision of the treaty, which says:

Particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts.

I find in no other treaty language as strong as that. The language of the Belgian treaty is about the general run of them. The language of the German treaty was read by the Senator from Georgia a moment ago, and it does not specify wages, if my recollection serves me correctly.

Mr. President, the point, however, after all, is this: Here we have human liberty to protect by an American law; we have human rights to protect; we have human life to safeguard by regulations of prevention as well as of efficiency. We undertake to do it. If we hamper our own ships in our own ports by certain provisions and do not make those provisions apply to the ships of other countries in those same ports, to the extent of the hampering regulation are we discriminating against our own merchant marine and enabling other nations, more reckless of human life or of human safety or of human liberty than we are, to compete against us successfully and to build up their merchant marine to the comparative destruction of ours.

We undertake, in spite of the treaty, to do this great work; and when we undertake to do it, we undertake to do it in the way in which the legislative body can act. The only way in which it can act is to insert in the proposed law that, in so far as it conflicts with any treaty provision, we request the President to give notice of abrogation according to the terms of that treaty, and that the provisions of this act conflicting with such treaty shall not take effect until after the expiration of the period of the notice of abrogation.

The general principle of international law is precisely the contrary of what was apprehended by the Senator from Georgia. It is only when specific international law comes into operation—to wit, the express language of treaties or conventions—that international law decides a case upon that side. In this very instance it is a case of the specific provisions of a treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a vote, Mr. President, on the pending substitute, if there is no further argument.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to be heard before the vote is taken. I can proceed, if necessary, to-night, but I do not really like the idea, when I know everyone is impatient and going away, that I should go ahead. I do not mind the personal sacrifice, but it does not seem quite right to insist that I go on to-night.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I supposed the Senator had concluded his argument.

Mr. BURTON. I have not. I wish to make some further observations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There has been no reply to anything the Senator has said.

Mr. BURTON. I have not quite concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I supposed the Senator had concluded. If he would like to go on this evening, I am perfectly willing that we should continue the session until the Senator concludes.

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer very much not to go on this evening. If necessary, however, I will proceed.

Mr. STONE. Well, Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have some—

Mr. BURTON. I will say further that there are some amendments that I may wish to prepare to the pending bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In order to meet the views of various Senators, and as we have been in protracted session since 12 o'clock, I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the Senate adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. KERN. I was about to make that motion. I move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 23, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 22, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art ever with us to uphold, sustain, and guide in every noble resolve and worthy purpose, be with us now that we may not forget that "righteousness exalteth a nation while sin is a reproach to any people"; that we may know Thy will and strive to do it in the full consciousness that right is might and will prevail. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1673. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extensions of time within which to comply with the law and make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Grant and Franklin, State of Washington.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Seventh International Congress of the World's Purity Federation to be held in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, November 7 to 12, 1913; and

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee from House and Senate to attend Congress Hall celebration in Philadelphia in October, 1913.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. Why not do business for one day, anyhow?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 39, answered "present" 12, not voting 304, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 23, 1913.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

IMPORTS AND DUTIES UNDER TARIFF ACT (S. DOC. NO. 217).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, a copy of the estimated receipts from customs for the year 1915, etc.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the communication lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1673) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extensions of time within which to comply with the law and make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Grant and Franklin, State of Washington, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the passage of Senate bill 4, known as the seamen's bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of Honolulu, Hawaii, favoring the enactment of legislation approving act No. 136 of the laws of Hawaii of 1913, relating to the franchise of the Honolulu Rapid Transit & Land Co. (Ltd.), which were referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

PURCHASE OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 122) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 3342) for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATOR GEORGE C. PERKINS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram which I wish to read to the Senate. It is as follows:

OAKLAND, CAL., October 21, 1913.

Hon. CHARLES P. HIGGINS.

Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your telegram, during the 20 years or more since I have been Senator I have been absent from my seat but 19 days when Congress was in session. I have also attended daily the Senate sessions during the extra session of Congress until October 7, when obliged to absent myself on account of illness. I will return to the Senate again as soon as I am able to travel.

GEORGE C. PERKINS.

I wish to state, Mr. President, in behalf of Senator PERKINS, that I have been his pair for 10 years, and very seldom has the pair ever been announced in the Senate. I have never known a Senator to be more faithful to his duties in the Senate than that Senator.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 767) granting permission to the city of Marshfield, Oreg., to close Mill Slough in said city.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) to provide for furnishing the additional rooms in the House Office Building, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the Chair lays before the Senate the special order, which is Senate bill 136.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert a substitute.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand that by unanimous consent the bill is taken up now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the understanding of the Chair that it is now in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think there is any doubt about that, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order, according to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The bill is now in order. There can be no question about that, I think, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it does not promise favorably for a careful consideration of this bill when we note that there are, I believe, by actual count only 17 Senators present. I do not wish to raise the point of no quorum, at least not at this time, and I will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that when the Senator makes that statement he raises it. When a Senator says there are only 17 Senators present he has raised the point that there is no quorum, and under the rule it necessitates that the roll shall be called.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Georgia mean to say that even the suggestion of an absence of a quorum in a speech requires that the roll shall be called?

Mr. BACON. I say whenever it is stated by a Senator on the floor of the Senate that less than a quorum is present, in my opinion that is not only the suggestion but a positive statement of the absence of a quorum. It is more than a suggestion; it is a positive statement that by actual count a quorum is not present. That is my understanding of the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before that is done I want to know whether that is the suggestion of the absence of a quorum or not. Is the Chair prepared to rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that when a Senator, without discussing anything whatever, states that there are only 17 Senators present, it is the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, and that it is the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In my opinion the mere statement of a Senator is not the official channel by which the presence or absence of a quorum is suggested and his count of the number of Senators is not official. But if the Chair rules that that can be done, without any discussion, I have nothing to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When a Senator says he desires a larger audience before proceeding and says there are only 17 Senators present he inferentially suggests the absence of a quorum, which must be settled by a roll call.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My point is that the mere statement that in the opinion of a Senator, who says that he has counted and, according to his vision, less than the number that constitute a quorum are present is not a demand that the question of a quorum be raised officially in the manner prescribed.

Mr. SMOOT. When a roll call is not specially asked for.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And when the Senator making it off-hand denies any intention of raising the question of a quorum when he makes the statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But, Mr. President, he does raise it in a more concrete form than as though he had said he suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If that is true, it is also true—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suppose the suggestion was made that it should appear of record that there was not a quorum here at the time the debate was opened.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, of course, a vote taken now would be void in the absence of a quorum. Yet I direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that when he obtained the very unanimous-consent agreement under which we are operating the same suggestion was made by myself, that, by actual count, there were only 19 Senators upon the floor, and that was not taken to be the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, and unanimous consent was given.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is perfectly clear that the question of a quorum is going to be raised sooner or later to-day. That is indicated by the statement of the Senator from Ohio. While he announced that there was not any quorum present, he followed it with the statement that he did not purpose to raise that question at this time, although he had raised it. So we are going to have to meet it sooner or later to-day, and we might as well start early and ascertain just how many Senators we have here in the city.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, far be it from me to attempt to preclude anyone from suggesting the absence of a quorum. I think a quorum ought to be here, and it ought to have been here all the time if important business is going to be transacted. I am simply directing attention to the fact that I do not think up to this time the question of the presence or absence of a quorum has been raised in a manner which compels the Presiding Officer to order the Secretary to call the roll. I may be entirely wrong about it, but that is my view, and I so stated it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	McCumber	Sterling
Bacon	Dillingham	McLean	Sutherland
Borah	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Swanson
Brady	Hollis	Nelson	Thornton
Brandegee	Jackson	O'Gorman	Tillman
Bristow	James	Overman	Vardaman
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Walsh
Burton	Kern	Shafroth
Chamberlain	La Follette	Sheppard
Clapp	Lane	Smoot

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANDELL]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce for the information of the Senate that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. GOFF, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WEEKS answered to their names.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is unavoidably detained from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I also wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is unavoidably detained from the city and is paired. I ask that these announcements stand for the day.

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent from the Senate on account of illness, and that he has a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I also wish to announce that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is absent on account of important business. I ask that these announcements stand for the day.

At 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

At 11 o'clock and 35 minutes a. m. Mr. REED and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in order to economize time until the next Senator comes in to help make a quorum, if it is in order to make any remarks, I will make a few remarks now for a minute or two. If the Chair prefers they should be deferred, I will defer them until after a quorum is developed.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Remarks are not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules nothing can be done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Nothing can be done; but it did not follow from what I said that anything was about to be done. [Laughter.]

At 11 o'clock and 42 minutes a. m. Mr. SMITH of South Carolina entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

At 11 o'clock and 49 minutes a. m. Mr. BRADLEY entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

At 11 o'clock and 52 minutes a. m. Mr. MARTIN of Virginia and Mr. THOMAS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

At 11 o'clock and 58 minutes a. m. Mr. MYERS, Mr. CHILTON, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock meridian). Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will now proceed to make a few brief remarks that I would have made while the Senate was ascertaining the presence of a quorum. It is not an important matter at this time, but it might at some time be of consequence. Therefore I desire to state for the Record that after the morning business has been closed, as long as the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now working shall be in existence, in my opinion the unfinished business does not come automatically before the Senate. Rule VIII provides that—

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar of bills and resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock.

Of course that 2 o'clock is upon the assumption that the Senate meets at 12, and there is a subsequent resolution of the Senate which provides that if the Senate meets at any other hour it shall consider under Rule VIII bills on the calendar until two hours after the time of the meeting of the Senate. So to-day, for instance, when the announcement was made by the Chair that morning business was closed, in my opinion until the hour of 1 o'clock should have arrived, that being two hours after 11, at which time we convened to-day, the pending bill, the subject of the unanimous-consent agreement, could not come before the Senate unless by unanimous consent or unless upon motion made and carried.

It seems to me that must be so, unless the unanimous-consent agreement, which was that on last Thursday the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the pending bill, and that not later than at 4 o'clock on Thursday, October 23, 1913, the Senate will proceed without further debate to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, and so forth, shall be construed to have abolished morning business; and I do not think it did or could be so construed. Evidently the Senate has not thought so, because we have been proceeding with morning business regularly each day since that consent agreement was adopted.

I simply want to put in the Record my view of the question, that when the morning business is closed, as it was this morning within 5 or 10 minutes after we convened, the pending bill, which is the unfinished business upon the calendar and would come up automatically therefore two hours after the opening of the Senate, could not come before the Senate under the rules except by unanimous consent or upon a motion made and carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the same opinion as the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Connecticut will say to the Chair that he understood the Chair to have previously ruled otherwise or else he would not have made these remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I read the unanimous-consent agreement, and am frank to say I read it as it operated October 16.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Connecticut had no motive in making his remarks except that it might appear in the Record that if the ruling of the Chair was to be so construed I desired to differ with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling will not be taken as a precedent; and if the question arises again it will be an open question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill S. 136 does come before the Senate immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business—that is, not at the close of the morning hour, but after the routine morning business—and whenever the Chair announces that the routine morning business is closed this bill should be placed, under the unanimous-consent agreement, before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as that view differs from the one just expressed by me, may I ask the Senator what language in the unanimous-consent agreement justifies his construction?

Mr. SMOOT. The language is this:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Thursday, October 16, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill S. 136—

And so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What of it? I agree that the Senator has correctly read so much of the agreement as he has read, but it does not seem to me to bear out the statement which he has just made.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that the routine morning business closes immediately upon the Chair announcing that the morning business is closed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It certainly does.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the conclusion of the routine morning business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Then this bill will come up for consideration under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all. The Senator is now stating something not contained in the agreement. The agreement from which he has correctly cited states that on Thursday, October 16—which was a week ago—the Senate, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business of the Senate, shall proceed to the consideration of the bill. All that was done a week ago, and nothing, so far, that I have read would justify the statement that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business each succeeding day the Senate shall take up forthwith the bill and proceed with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator takes the position that the unanimous-consent agreement applied only to Thursday, October 16, as far as taking the bill up immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It simply fixes the time when the Senate will take it up.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator thinks it should not apply to any day after Thursday, October 16?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not unless it says so. The Senator's view, I assume, is that the Senate should continue the consideration of the bill without interruption until acted upon, and yet the mere suggestion of morning business each day acknowledges the interruption of it; and having interrupted it with morning business, then we are subject to the rules governing morning business, and one rule says that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business the Senate shall proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps, technically, that would be right, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to be further borne out by the Record that the bill was also made the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. If it is necessary, I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, as I understand the ruling has been made that it is not before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate several telegrams of exceptional importance which I have just received. The first is one from Senator CRAWFORD, who for weeks was upon the subcommittee which last winter considered this bill. He states in a telegram dated at Huron, S. Dak., October 22:

I am leaving for Washington to-night. Can not arrive before Friday evening. Am for the Nelson bill.

I very much regret Senator CRAWFORD's absence.

In the statement that I made a few days ago in regard to the men who first responded and who were chosen on the Grosser Kurfurst at the time of the Voltorno disaster, I am inclined to think that I was in some error. Either my information was inaccurate or I misunderstood a conversation. However, a very considerable share of the men who took part in the work of rescue were other than sailors. I have asked that an exact statement be furnished me of the men who manned the boats. This is given by Capt. Moeller, the local superintendent of the North German Lloyd Line at Hoboken, after he had made full inquiry. It is to be noted that the Grosser Kurfurst came close to the Voltorno, and, I understand, was the first that succeeded in taking passengers off the burning ship. I now read a telegram received from Capt. Moeller:

Besides sailors, also stewards, scullery men, and coal trimmers volunteered and were picked to man lifeboats of Kurfurst. Captain reports first lifeboat under second officer.

Then he goes on to tell of what the crew was made up:

One quartermaster, one sailmaker, four sailors, one boiler maker, one coal trimmer.

So there were three who were not sailors in this crew.

Second lifeboat under third officer, six sailors, three stewards, one trimmer.

Making six sailors and four others of the crew.

Third lifeboat under fourth officer, two quartermasters, two sailors, two stewards, one scullery man, two trimmers.

Two quartermasters and two sailors would make four, and there were five others—two stewards, one scullery man, and two trimmers.

The last boat was manned by a majority of nonsailors.

These three lifeboats went to rescue at night during heavy storm and high sea and saved 32 persons from Voltorno before daybreak. Rescue after daybreak comparatively easy account moderated weather.

I repeat that not only our sailors but all the men employed in the different departments on board are constantly drilled in handling lifeboats.

I have here also a telegram from the master of the Kroonland, which was engaged in the work of rescue. It states:

When my ship rescued 88 people from burning Voltorno, heavy gale blowing and a terrific sea running. Many volunteers from all departments of my crew offered to go in the boats. All were eligible for the work of handling the lifeboats. I selected crews composed of sailors, firemen, and stewards; in my judgment, the said firemen and stewards being more competent for the work than some of the deck hands, due to our frequent training in boat drills. Launched three boats.

On this same subject I wish to read a letter from a man conversant with conditions on the Great Lakes, from the manager of a great passenger line at Detroit, which for many years has had no accidents whatever. It is from Mr. A. A. Schanz, manager of the Detroit & Buffalo Line. He says:

With reference to our conversation last Tuesday evening regarding the lake seamen's efficiency in handling lifeboats, I am pleased to say our company gives cash prizes for the most efficient crew on each of our steamers, and before the close of the navigation season we give a grand prize to the most efficient crew of all of our fleet. The prize on each boat for the most efficient crew is $50 and the grand prize is $200, so there is quite a competition between our crews on each steamer in their work in this direction. Last year on the steamer City of St. Ignace we had a crew of firemen who were made up of Greeks who had never sailed up to that year, but they won the prize on that steamer for the best handling of their boats, oarsmanship, and everything pertaining thereto. When the time came to have the contest for the grand prize this crew of Greeks won the first prize on account of their great efficiency.

We have 10 boats in our fleet, and in a number of cases the steward's crew were first in efficiency. The able-seamen crew were usually second or third.

Then he goes on to say what is perfectly well understood, that the frequent changes of personnel, the comparatively short service of the seamen, diminishes their efficiency and makes them less suitable for the handling of boats, because they do not know the arrangement of the mechanism, the davits, or the location of the boats.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. There is a little bit of matter pertaining to this handling of boats at sea and in rough water which I do not think is being given the attention which it deserves. I do not think that the Senator from Ohio—although I do not question his sincerity at all—understands the question. The handling of a boat in a rough sea and the launching of a boat, the lowering it from davits at sea, is entirely different from anything which ever occurs at all in inland waters, I think, of the Lakes even.

The claim of the seamen—able seamen, men who have been at sea—that it requires two men, able-bodied seamen, men of experience before the mast, to lower a boat is founded upon experience that goes back for hundreds of years. It is known everywhere among men who live upon the sea and by the sea and who go down to the sea in ships that there is all the difference in the world between an oarsman, even on the prize crew of Harvard or Oxford, and a man who can handle an oar in rough water at sea. I have handled a boat and I have pulled in salt water against a head wind and against a tide, and I know the difference.

I do not like to have this information passed out to Senators. Although, as I said, I make no question of the sincerity of the Senator from Ohio, I know, however, from the way he talks and the number of hours that I have stood by and pulled an oar that he knows nothing about the proposition of which he speaks in that respect.

An able-bodied seaman is as entirely different from a land-lubber or a fireman as a trained musician is from an amateur. An able-bodied seaman has to know how to handle lines, and running through blocks, and how to work in unison with his mate. He works in as exact harmony of movement as a musician does at the beating of the wand of a bandmaster, and it comes from training. It is a trick of the wrist. It comes from experience, and no man can let down a boat from the davits through the block and tackle and handle a line in a storm who does not know how to pay it out with the man who stands at the bow if he is at the stern, or the man at the stern if he is at the bow. A green hand, if he is a fireman or if he be a graduate of Harvard or Oxford or the president of the institution, will rip the skin off his hands and burn them down to the bone if he lets it go down with a run. He has got to know how to snub his line and hold it and watch what the other man is doing and lay the boat down on an even keel into the suds of the breakers which are hammering against the side of the ship.

Go into Alaska, high up into the Aleutian Islands, and you will find Eskimos who will throw their boats over into the surf and breakers from off the cliff and lay them on an even keel and trip out to sea as light as a swallow floats through the air. Put a greenhorn crew in those skin boats and you will drown every last man of them. The man who lets down a boat from the davits must pay attention to the hand of the man who stands at the other end.

Mr. BURTON. I ask the Senator from Oregon how much longer he probably will wish to address the Senate.

Mr. LANE. I do not want to address the Senate a minute longer in the time of the Senator. When he gets through I will try to throw some light on this subject. I want to show up this proposition. I have gotten tired of hearing this talk by sea lawyers about handling boats at sea. I have been to sea in all kinds of crafts.
